Mr. JENCKES. This bill sufficiently explains itself. It is the case of an application for an extension in which everything was regularly proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, but from the omission of a five cent stamp on one of the papers the then acting commissioner was not satisfied that he should take jurisdiction of the case. Hence he rejected the application. It enables the Commissioner of Patents to act on the case as he would have done if the five cent stamp had been attached. It makes no grant of any right.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has the gentleman given this matter his personal examination?

Mr. JENCKES. It was considered by the Committee on Patents, and reported on favorably.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING STAR NEWSPAPER COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 209) to incorporate the Evening Star Newspaper Company; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WELKER. I move that the bill be put on its passage.

The bill was read. It proposes to create and declare Crosby S. Noyes, Clarence B. Baker, Alexander R. Shepherd, George W. Adams, and Samuel H. Kauffmann, and their associates and successors, a body corporate and politic, by the name and style of the Evening Star Newspaper Company of Washington, for the purpose of carrying on the business of printing and publishing at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, with the usual powers and privileges of a corporation. The capital stock of the company is not to be less than $100,000, nor more than $200,000, in shares of $1,000 each. It is also provided that each stockholder shall be individually liable for the debts of the company to the extent of his stock at its par value.

Mr. SHANKS. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

A MEMBER. Mr. Wallach's name is not in the bill.

Mr. SHANKS. I thought it was. I withdraw the motion.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UMATILLA RESERVATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 215) to vacate and sell the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the bill be put on its passage.

The bill was read. The first section directs the superintendent of Indian affairs for the State of Oregon, if practicable, to negotiate a treaty with the Indians now living on the Umatilla reservation in that State, providing for the relinquishment by said Indians to the United States of their right and claim to the reservation, and for their removal to some other reservation or reservations to be selected in said State or in the Territory of Washington, and to be described in the treaty, and it appropriates $2,000 for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the treaty. The second section requires that provision shall be made in the proposed treaty securing to the Indians the full value of their lands, together with the value of all improvements thereon, and that no part of the lands shall be sold for less than $1 25 an acre.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think there is any urgent necessity to pass this bill now.

Mr. WINDOM. It reduces the number of agents in Oregon and the expenses of the Government.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN F. MASCHER'S PATENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of Eliza Mascher, widow of John F. Mascher; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It proposes to authorize Eliza Mascher, administratrix of John F. Mascher, deceased, who obtained a patent No. 9611, for an improvement in daguerreotype cases, dated the 8th of March, 1853, with additional improvement, No. 134, annexed to said original patent, dated 19th of February, 1856, for fourteen years, which expired on the 8th day of March, 1867, to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of said patent for seven years, under the regulations now in force for the extension of patents, as if she had made application previous to its expiration, as required by law; and the Commissioner of Patents is directed to investigate and decide the application for extension on the same evidence and in the same manner as other applications for extension are decided. The application for extension is to be made within thirty days after the approval of this act, and the decision of the Commissioner rendered within ninety days after the filing of the application in the Patent Office. Nothing in this act is to be so construed as to hold responsible in damages any person who may have manufactured or used the daguerreotype cases, with the improvement and addition aforesaid, or used cases containing the improvement and addition aforesaid, between the expiration of the patent and the approval of this act. The Commissioner shall be satisfied before granting such extension that it will insure entirely to the benefit of the said Eliza Mascher.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not think this ought to pass.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill merely for the correction of an error. It grants no extension, but simply allows a poor woman, the widow of a very worthy man, well known in Philadelphia, to apply and obtain the decision of the Commissioner of Patents, as though no mistake had been made. I demand the previous question.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 36, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MYERS, and WASHBURN of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 31.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISRAEL T. CANBY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 428) for the relief of the sureties of Israel T. Canby, late receiver of public moneys at Crawfordsville, Indiana; which was read a first and second time.

The bill proposes to release the sureties of Israel T. Canby, late receiver of public moneys at the land office at Crawfordsville, Indiana, from all liability arising from any defalcation, omission, or misconduct of his as such receiver; and it directs the proper officers of the Treasury Department to dismiss any and all suits and actions that may have been instituted against the sureties, and to enter the proper discharges on the books of the Department.

Mr. WARD. I think this bill should go to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. KERR. I hope not. I desire to say a word.

Mr. WARD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. KERR. This is not a very important bill so far as the Government is concerned, but it is important to the parties interested in it. It passed the Senate by an almost unanimous vote. I hold in my hand a report by Senator WILLEY from the committee to whom it was referred, giving the entire history of the suit, stating the amounts that have been realized by the Government heretofore, the amount that remains uncollected, the amount of assets that have come into the hands of the Government officers from time to time, and showing in the clearest possible manner that justice cannot be done to these sureties, except by the dismissal of this suit. I will read the conclusion of the report.

Mr. ORTH. I desire to ask if the gentleman has the names of the three sureties referred to.

Mr. KERR. I have.

Mr. ORTH. Who are they?

Mr. KERR. They are Nathan B. Palmer, of Indianapolis, Michael G. Bright and Jeremiah Sullivan, of Madison, Indiana, all of whom are now venerable in years, and two of them very feeble in health.

Mr. ORTH. All right.

Mr. KERR. I will now read the conclusion of the Senate report on this subject.

"Considering the great length of time which has elapsed since the original default of the principal; considering the fact that only three of his sureties are now living; considering the laches of the Government in not making an earlier adjustment of the case, when the facts involved in it could have been easily and certainly ascertained, for the neglect of doing which no reason whatever is shown; considering the fact apparent on the face of the foregoing statement that sufficient effects of the said Canby had been transferred to and placed in the hands of the officers and agents of the Government, which, if those agents and officers had exercised reasonable diligence, would have realized an amount amply sufficient to have satisfied the default aforesaid of the said Canby; considering that the Government was so thoroughly convinced that said effects were more than sufficient for its purposes it voluntarily released to said Canby a portion of said effects, to wit: what is called in the foregoing statement the Illinois lands; considering the facts admitted that prior to October 10, 1845, there had been realized and accounted for to the Government out of the effects so transferred to the Government as aforesaid the sum of $20,694 83 in cash, and that the Government then still had in its hands notes taken for sale of lands of said Canby, $32,655 88, and notes transferred by Canby to the Government for the further sum of $10,957 66, and that the Government had under its control other lands of the said Canby still unsold; considering that the Government is now unable to account for said notes, lands, &c., rendering it probable that portions of said notes may have been collected by its agents and not accounted for, and the remainder, in whole or in part, may have been so neglected by the agents of the Government as to render their collection at this time impracticable; in fine, considering that the Government having received under its own control, or the effects of said Canby, ample indemnity for his said default, which it failed to make fully available through its own neglect or the negligence and default of its authorized agents, and is now itself unable to account for the means placed in its hands, the committee are of opinion that it would now, thirty-five years after the default of the principal, be harsh and unjust to make his few surviving securities responsible. They therefore recommend the passage of the said bill."

Mr. Speaker, in addition, I invite attention to the affidavits of Judge Sullivan in reference to some of the facts and the history of this case. Judge Sullivan is an ex-judge of the supreme court of Indiana, and all these surviving sureties are gentlemen of the highest respectability and have filled many positions of distinction in our State. The affidavit reads as follows:

STATE OF INDIANA, County of Jefferson, ss:

Jeremiah Sullivan, being duly sworn, deposes and says, that he was one of the sureties of Israel T. Canby, on his bond as receiver of public monies at Crawfordsville, Indiana.

That when it was discovered at the Treasury Department that said Canby was a defaulter, a warrant was issued against him and his sureties and placed in the hands of the marshal of the district with instructions to levy the same. This deponent knows that said warrant was executed, in part because it was levied on his personal property, a part of which was sold; but proceedings on said warrant were stayed, as deponent believes, in consequence of an arrangement for a settlement of the debt, as hereinafter stated, between said Canby and the Government.

Deponent says that upon a settlement of accounts between Canby and the Government he (Canby,) as deponent was informed, assigned and transferred to the United States lands and other property to an amount sufficient to pay his debt to the Government, and thereupon all legal proceedings were suspended.

Deponent says that General T. A. Howard was the Attorney of the United States in the adjustment of the above matter with said Canby, and in the reception of the property transferred, as he was informed and believes; and said Howard, in more than one conversation with deponent while he (Howard) was acting as such attorney, informed deponent that the property so transferred by Canby was sufficient to pay the balances against him. Many of the circumstances connected with the settlement between the United States Attorney and Canby have escaped deponent's recollection, (from thirty-six to forty years having elapsed) and much of the conversation with General Howard at the time is forgotten; but deponent felt easy under the assurances given him as above stated, and he dismissed the matter from his mind.

Deponent will further state the impression remaining on his mind that the late Governor Hendricks, of Indiana, informed him that the property transferred by Canby was sufficient to pay Canby's debt to the Government. Mr. Hendricks was well acquainted with the value of the lands transferred, and he exerted himself to secure the Government and relieve Canby and his securities. Governor Hendricks, General Howard, (district attorney at the time) Gamaliel Taylor, then marshal of the district, Canby himself, and some of the deponent's cosureties, are now dead, in consequence of which, the surviving cosureties are deprived of any assistance they might, and probably could, get from them to show that they should not be held to further accountability as the sureties of said Canby.

Deponent says that, relying on said assurances, he rested quietly and made no effort to secure himself or indemnify himself against his liability on said bond. The Government, by her agents, having taken property at its valuation, estimated at the time to be sufficient to pay the debt, and the main witnesses to the transaction being now dead, the deponent asks that a final discharge be given to him and his cosureties from the above mentioned bond.

JEREMIAH SULLIVAN.

STATE OF INDIANA, Jefferson County, ss:

Subscribed and sworn to before me, Walter S. Roberts, a notary public, in and for said county, this 23d day of June, 1868, by Jeremiah Sullivan.

Witness my hand and official seal.

WALTER S. ROBERTS,
Notary Public.

Mr. Speaker, my lack of time under the rules forbids me to go more fully into the facts in this case. But I earnestly appeal to the House to refuse the motion to refer, and to let this bill be now passed. The entire fault is the result of the negligence of the Government's own agents, and not of these surviving sureties, and I think that upon every principle of justice they should now be discharged.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to know how many years have elapsed since the original default.

Mr. KERR. Over thirty-five years. This case is one demanding immediate action, as a matter of the most clear and simple justice to the parties, and I earnestly hope that the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] will not be adopted.

Mr. WARD. I never heard of this case before. I know nothing about it; but from the statement just made by the gentleman from Indiana, it is apparent that there are a great many facts to be considered and a great many questions to be examined. It has received the sanction of no committee of this House. There has been no investigation of its merits or demerits by any committee. This is the heel of the session, and I hold that we ought to send all such bills to the committees for investigation, and especially that class of bills which propose to relieve parties who are under liability to the Government. This may be all right; it may be all wrong. We are not in the habit of being concluded by the action of the Senate. We are in the habit of investigating these matters for ourselves. If it is all right, as gentlemen claim, the Committee of Claims in a few months will ascertain that fact and report it to the House, and the House, acting on that report, can pass the bill. If it is all wrong, the committee can so report. If we pass the bill now without due consideration, we may make a grave mistake, and therefore I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. KERR. I hope the reference will not be made.

Mr. WARD. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was put on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of Claims; and there were—ayes 72, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that two members of the Committee on Enrolled Bills are absent on account of sickness. The business of that committee is very materially increased on the last day of the session, and if there is no objection the Chair will appoint an additional member. The Chair hears no objection, and appoints Mr. LAFLIN, of New York.

CREDENTIALS OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER presented the credentials of W. P. Edwards, Representative-elect from the third congressional district of Georgia; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

ELIZABETH CARSON.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 536, for the relief of Elizabeth Carson; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 533, in addition to an act to regulate the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that whenever any person shall have been elected a Senator in Congress, in the manner provided in the first section of the act to which this act is an addition, and shall have died or refused to accept said office before the commencement of his term of office, the Legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after it shall have notice of such death or refusal, to elect another person Senator in Congress in the manner provided in the first section of the act to which this act is an addition.

Mr. MAYNARD. It seems to me that that bill is defective. It ought to apply only to cases when the Legislature is in session. As it now stands, it would compel an extra session. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF THE CENTER MARKET.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 394, to provide for the removal of the Center market, in the city of Washington, and for the erection of a market building in a more suitable locality; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would be glad if the House would consider that bill at the present time and pass it.

Mr. WELKER. I desire that it be referred. Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to its reference. We have had that annoyance on the avenue long enough, and I hope we shall get rid of it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the bill be read.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask for the reading.

The bill was read. The first section authorizes the Commissioner of Public Buildings to cause to be removed within twelve months all the buildings, sheds, and tenements of every description now located on the Government reservation on Pennsylvania avenue, between Seventh and Ninth streets west, and occupied as a city market, or for other purposes, and to cause the reservation to be inclosed and preserved in the same manner as other reservations now under his charge. The second section provides that the materials of the present market buildings are to be turned over to the mayor of the city of Washington for such public purposes as may be deemed proper under the direction of the corporate authorities of the city. The third section authorizes the corporate authorities of the city of Washington to enter upon and occupy, as a permanent site for a market-house, all of that portion of the public reservation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, bounded as follows: commencing one hundred feet south of the southeast corner of block three hundred and fifty, as marked on the plat of the city of Washington; thence west five hundred and eleven feet and four inches to a point one hundred feet south of the southwest corner of block three hundred and twenty-four; thence south one hundred and seventy feet along the east side of Twelfth street west; thence east five hundred and eleven feet four inches to a point on the west side of Tenth street west; thence north one hundred and seventy feet to the place of beginning.

The fourth section provides that for the purpose of erecting such market-house it is to be lawful for the said corporation to create a debt, in such form as may be found most expedient, not exceeding the sum of $200,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, notwithstanding any restriction in the charter of the city or existing laws to the contrary; but the Government of the United States in no event whatever is to be liable for the principal or interest upon any such loan; and the entire revenue of the building after paying contingent expenses and interest on the loan is to be appropriated to the payment of the money borrowed for that purpose. No more than $220,000 are to be expended in building the market-house, nor are any contracts to be entered into which involve a larger expenditure for its completion. The fifth section provides that the corporate authorities of Washington shall have the right to hold and use the property so long as the building to be erected thereon shall be maintained as a market-house, and no longer; and that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act shall be repealed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to state that by the provisions of this bill the Government of the United States is not made liable for one farthing of expense for the construction of a new market-house, or for the bonds or indebtedness of the city government. It provides for removing the old nuisance and eye-sore on the great avenue of the city, and for erecting a new market-house two blocks further up the canal and one block further from the avenue. Probably no more accessible site for a market-house can be procured than the one proposed by this bill. If the members of the House are as tired of this horrid nuisance on the avenue as I am, and as the citizens of this District are, then this Congress will allow the city authorities to appropriate money to build a new market-house. Three thousand of the business men of this city have petitioned for the passage of this bill as it passed the Senate. In my judgment we can do no better than to pass this bill; and I call the previous question.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The question was taken upon laying the bill on the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 46, noes 47; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ALLISON and Mr. INGERSOLL were appointed.

The House again divided; but the tellers disagreeing in regard to the count, Mr. ELIOT and Mr. MARSHALL were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 70, noes 47.

Before the result was announced, Mr. INGERSOLL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. Mr. ALLISON. If there be no objection, I will agree that the motion to lay on the table be withdrawn, and that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the motion to lay on the table will be regarded as withdrawn, and the bill will be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

There was no objection; and the bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment House bill No. 433, for the relief of Palemon John.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, House bill No. 1375, to transfer to the Department of the Interior certain powers and duties now exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with Indian affairs.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 575) to refer the claim of Joseph Segar to the Court of Claims, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had adopted a concurrent resolution suspending for the residue of the session the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS, ETC., SIGNED.

PORTAGE LAKE SHIP-CANAL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 398) extending the Portage Lake and Lake Superior ship-canal to Keweenaw bay, providing for the right of way, and making a grant of land to aid in the continuance of said extension; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DRIGGS. I hope this bill will be acted on now.

The bill, which was read, provides in the first section that the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company, a company organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, be authorized to construct a breakwater in Keweenaw bay, Lake Superior, not exceeding two thousand feet in width, on the bank of that bay, and a ship-canal from the most eligible point in the bay to Portage Lake, which canal shall be at least one hundred feet in width, and not less than thirteen feet in depth. The canal company is to remove the rocks in Portage Lake, so as to secure free and unobstructed navigation, with thirteen feet water in the channel of said lake, through to the head thereof; and the right of way through the lake is granted to the company, not exceeding six hundred feet in width. The Secretary of War is to designate an engineer of the Army who shall examine the obstructions in the lake, and report the same to the Secretary, with maps thereof, and shall report to him when the work contemplated in this section shall be completed in a permanent manner. The engineer is also to ascertain whether any money has been expended to aid the navigation into Portage Lake, in the route of this ship canal; by whom expended, if any has been expended, the amount expended; and after deducting the reimbursements received, if any, by persons so expending money for that purpose he is to report the balance to the Secretary of War, if any balance is found, and establish the time in which the sum so found shall be paid. The grants contained in this act are to be subject to the payment of the money so actually expended. The second section grants to the State of Michigan for the use and benefit of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company, to aid in the construction of the work provided for in the first section, in accordance with the act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan in relation thereto, two hundred thousand acres of public land, to be selected from the odd-numbered sections in the Marquette land district, in the upper peninsula of Michigan, subject to sale or preemption, and which have been surveyed, but to which no preemption or homestead rights have attached, and which have not been reserved in any grant heretofore made by Congress nor otherwise disposed of, and which are not known upon the maps or reports of the public surveys as mineral. These lands may be selected by the company at any time, patents to issue therefor as hereinafter provided. The canal is to be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or charge upon the vessels of the Government, or upon vessels employed by it in the transportation of any property or troops of the United States. The third section requires that the company shall forthwith establish the route of the canal and the plan of the breakwater, and file plats or a plat thereof in the office of the War Department, and shall obtain the approval of the same by the Secretary of War; and all the expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act are to be borne by the company. The fourth section provides that if the breakwater and ship-canal shall not be completed according to the plans so approved by the Secretary of War, and the obstructions removed within five years from the passage of this act, the lands granted shall revert to the United States. But whenever the breakwater and ship-canal shall be completed according to the provisions of this act, and the obstructions removed, and the Secretary of War certify to the same, patents for the lands herein granted are to be issued to the company.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been passed by the Senate, I believe, unanimously. A certified copy of it was taken before the Committee on the Public Lands of this House, and was, after full discussion, agreed to by the committee, who instructed me to report the bill favorably to the House, with certain amendments.

The principal objection, and in fact the only one raised in committee, was that these lands were liable to be withheld from market and from the operation of the homestead and preemption laws. We have agreed on an amendment which completely obviates this objection, and provides also that the land shall be sold at a price not exceeding $2 50 per acre. We thus guard against the infliction of any hardship upon the settlers.

Another provision is that when this canal is completed—

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Kate F. Keene, of Washington city, a Government employé, for a twenty per cent. increase of the salaries of Government employés.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of John Hearing, a soldier of the war of 1812, for a pension.

Also, a memorial of 61 citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of a law investing all men with the equal exercise of the elective franchise in all the States.

Also, the petition of R. P. Jackson, executor of Francis Lowndes, deceased, praying for compensation for services rendered by said Lowndes.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Leonard Revis and 54 others, citizens of the third district of Pennsylvania, for greater protection to American industry.

Also, the petition of Mary Fryer, of Philadelphia, widow of John Fryer, deceased, seaman in the war of 1812, for Navy pension.

Also, the petition for pension of Ann Smith, of Philadelphia, widow of Simeon Smith, deceased, late of company D, fifty-eighth Pennsylvania volunteers.

By Mr. STOKES: The petition of Andrew S. Davis, of Cleveland, Tennessee.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 25, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. DRAKE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 579) to establish a new land district in the State of Nebraska.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1450) for the more speedy reorganization of the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1451) for the relief of John H. Osler, of Guernsey county, Ohio.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1275) relating to the Alexandria canal.

DENVER PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 570.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object. I have certain papers to present.

Mr. DRAKE. Why should the gentleman object?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I want to present some petitions.

Mr. DRAKE. I will give way for that purpose if the Senate will allow the bill to be taken up.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Very well, I surrender.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Wisconsin requires unanimous consent at this time.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 570) for a grant of land, granting the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, a company incorporated under the laws of the Territory of Colorado, to connect its road and telegraph with the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph at or near Cheyenne, and to provide that it shall have a uniform gauge, rate of freight and fare, and the privileges, immuni-ties, and obligations of other branches of the Union Pacific railroad, and to aid in its construction shall have similar grants of lands, right of way, with like conditions, limitations, and privileges, and upon the connection of the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph, eastern division, with this railroad and telegraph at Denver City, the company shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as though the whole line had been constructed by the eastern division company. The line from Denver to Cheyenne is to be taken in lieu of its construction of that portion of its route; and all the provisions contained in the several acts of Congress relating to the operation of the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph, the Central Pacific of California, and the branches of the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph so far as the Government, the public, and the railroad and branches are concerned, are to apply to the operation of the Denver Pacific railway and telegraph, the same as though they were here repeated, the design being to provide that the road shall, for the purpose of through business, be operated without change of cars or breaking bulk.

The Committee on the Pacific Railroad proposed several amendments to the bill. The first amendment was after the word "Cheyenne," in line seven, to insert "and with the Union Pacific railway, eastern division," at Denver.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was between the words "privileges" and "immunities," in line ten, to insert "and;" and after "immunities" to strike out the words "and obligations of other branches," and insert "except subsidy in bonds, and be subject to the obligations."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve to strike out "said" and insert "the;" and after "railroad," in the same line, to insert "company and its branches."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen to strike out "similar" and insert "like" before "grants."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after "privileges," in line fifteen, to insert:

Provided, That patents may be issued to said company, whenever it shall have completed twenty consecutive miles of its railroad and telegraph line, instead of forty miles, as now provided by law; whenever said company shall file in the Department of the Interior a certificate of the Governor and surveyor general of Colorado, whether a Territory or a State, duly sworn to by them before the judge of some court of record in Colorado, that twenty consecutive miles of the railroad and telegraph line of said company have been fully completed in a good and substantial manner, as contemplated by this act.

Mr. HARLAN. That amendment was drawn, I think, under a misapprehension of the existing law:

"That patents may be issued to said company whenever it shall have completed twenty consecutive miles of its railroad and telegraph line, instead of forty miles, as now provided by law."

That was the provision of the law of 1862; but in the law of 1864 there was a change made; the word "forty" was stricken out and the word "twenty" inserted in its place. I think that provision is unnecessary.

Mr. DRAKE. It will not do any harm. Let it stand.

Mr. HARLAN. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines twenty-eight and thirty-eight, to strike out "though" and insert "if."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following additional section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, may mortgage that part of its road between the point where its subsidy in bonds shall terminate and Denver City, together with its rolling stock, to an amount not exceeding $32,000 per mile; and the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company may mortgage its road and rolling stock to a like amount, for the purpose of enabling said companies to borrow money to construct their said roads.

Mr. DRAKE. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "mile," in line six, the words "which point shall be held and construed under existing laws to be at or near Cheyenne Wells, in Colorado, and not further west than the meridian of said Wells."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in favor of the amendment; but the Senate ought to know that the effect of it is to extend somewhat the subsidy of the eastern division. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad fully considered it. I am in favor of fixing the termination at that point, but I want the Senate to understand that the effect of it is somewhat to extend the subsidy to the eastern division.

Mr. STEWART. How much?

Mr. SHERMAN. About forty miles. These things ought to be distinctly understood by the Senate. The subsidy is not fixed, nor is it an ascertainable quantity now, because it is to be settled by the length of the line along the Republican, and that was never measured. It cannot now be ascertained, and it is difficult to tell what the present subsidy amounts to. The company have built the road out to a point which is admitted on all hands to be an inconvenient point for the termination of the subsidy. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad thought it better to fix the terminus at the point which on the testimony we think best, which is about forty miles beyond Fort Wallace.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is this granting additional subsidy?

Mr. SHERMAN. That will be the effect, to grant a subsidy as far as Cheyenne Wells, because as the Senator is probably aware the present terminus of the eastern division is not fixed by any geographical line; it is only fixed by the length of another line which has never been surveyed, and about which there would be great difference of opinion if it was surveyed. A change was made in the law in regard to the eastern division. The former law allowed them to go along the Republican Fork, striking the other road at the one hundredth meridian; but by a change in the law they were allowed to divert in another direction along the Smoky Hill, and were to be allowed the same amount of subsidy along the Smoky Hill that they would have had along the Republican Fork; but as the Republican Fork line was never surveyed the distance was never ascertained, nor can it be exactly ascertained, because dispute might arise as to where the railroad should go. It is impossible to fix the present termination; controversies were likely to spring up between the company and the United States; and the general testimony tended to show to the committee that it would terminate about Fort Wallace.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Where is that?

Mr. SHERMAN. On the Smoky Hill, about two hundred miles this side of Denver. This bill fixes the terminus at Cheyenne Wells on the route to Denver, about forty miles beyond what would probably be the termination of the present subsidy. I think it is a wise provision, but it is right that the Senate should understand distinctly what the legal effect of this amendment is.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state very briefly what the effect of this bill is. By the old law, as has been stated by the honorable Senator from Ohio, the eastern division or Kansas branch of the Pacific railroad had a right to a subsidy from the point of its commencement on the Missouri river to the one hundredth degree of longitude, passing up the Republican Fork. The company has never made an accurate survey of the length of that line, nor has the Government yet ascertained the exact length of that line; but an engineer has now been employed and is engaged in ascertaining its length. I have looked over the subject as carefully as I could with all the data I could obtain, with a view to ascertain the exact length of the line upon which it would be entitled to subsidy in land and bonds, and I find that that line will extend about forty-five miles west of the present point to which the eastern division is completed up the Smoky Hill Fork, and will necessitate the issuing of bonds to the amount, in addition to what they would be entitled to under the old law, of near eight hundred thousand dollars. It will probably fall short of $800,000, and will be between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars. I think my estimate has been as accurate as is practicable at the present time; but that is the result plainly enough.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad what provision exists for giving to this company more than they would receive if they had gone to the one hundredth meridian according to the original law. They have departed now, and as I understand they do not intend to join the main route at all, but to make a new road.

Mr. HOWARD. This bill absolutely requires them to construct the line to Denver City, and of course they are bound to construct the line beyond Denver City until it shall form a connection with the Omaha branch. There is no possibility under the law as it exists at present of diverging off to the south further.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is very true, but I was told by the president of the company distinctly, in an interview that he had with me, that it was not the intention of the company to join the main trunk, but to go off down through New Mexico.

Mr. CONNESS. This obliges them to do it.

Mr. HOWARD. This requires them to do it. What the Senator says is correct.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Have they changed their intention on that subject?

Mr. HOWARD. This bill requires them positively to form that connection, does not permit them to diverge.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. At what place?

Mr. HOWARD. Cheyenne Wells, which is about forty-five miles west of the point to which the company has already completed its line.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Where will they strike the main line to California?

Mr. HOWARD. They will strike the main line about fifty miles north of Denver.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is five hundred miles from this point.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know the length; but they are not entitled to any subsidy beyond Cheyenne Wells. They will strike the main line at a place known as Cheyenne City, which is almost exactly north of Denver at a distance of about fifty miles.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Four or five hundred miles from the point to which this bill gives them a subsidy. How are they to get there?

Mr. CONNESS. Not so far.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Three hundred miles, anyhow.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know the exact distance, but it is certainly not as far as five hundred miles.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When this company changed the route and went by the Smoky Hill line it was understood at the time that they got an improved quality of lands, went through a rich country, and had the benefit of the lands on the route. Now, what is the reason which exists why, in consequence of their changing the route and making the distance greater, we should give them $800,000 more?

Mr. DRAKE. I will state, for the information of the honorable Senator from Maine that if the road is obliged to terminate at Fort Wallace it terminates at a point where it renders no real service to anybody, to the Government, to the road itself, or to the people. It is out in a waste there, which has no objective point, nor any real connection with any portion of that country that would amount to anything. Cheyenne Wells is a point in Colorado some forty miles west of Fort Wallace, a well-known point of assembly and departure for trains, for people connected with the Army and with all that region through Colorado. It is a point where there is abundance of water and abundance of forage, and wagon trains go from that point through all that region, and come from all that region to that point. It is the point of departure, too, for Fort Lyon.

The position of the thing, then, is this: whether it is not better for the Government and for the people everywhere to terminate this road at a point which is so well known and resorted to as Cheyenne Wells rather than terminate it at Fort Wallace. I have a letter from General Schofield, the Secretary of War, on that subject, which I will send to the Clerk's desk, and I ask to have it read for the information of the Senate. It states the whole case in very brief terms.

The Chief Clerk read the following letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, July 4, 1868.

SIR: In reply to your communication of July 2, respecting the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, in which you desire to know the wishes of the War Department as to the proposed extension of Government aid to that road as far as Cheyenne Wells, I have no hesitation in recommending the proposed extension.

By reference to a letter from General Sherman to General Grant, dated March 4, 1868, now before Congress, it will be seen that a much greater aid is recommended than that now proposed, and that the road is spoken of as a military necessity.

No man could be better able to judge of this matter than General Sherman, and I have no hesitation in indorsing his opinion.

I believe near Cheyenne Wells is the most easterly point where a temporary depot for the supplies destined for Fort Lyon and the posts beyond can be made so as to conveniently subserve the military interests.

Abundant water and forage at that point make it more suitable than any other point further east for such depot, while the distance (about forty miles) from Fort Wallace to Cheyenne Wells, will be saved in wagon transportation of supplies.

The proposed extension appears to be a measure of economy to the Government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Secretary of War.

Hon. C. D. DRAKE, United States Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no doubt that is the opinion of the Secretary of War; and I have no doubt that if this road be extended there, it will be convenient and save money to the Government in the way of transportation. But the whole course of this thing is to me disagreeable. I do not like it in any part of it. In the first place, this road was chartered to join the main road at the one hundredth meridian. They laid out their road in that direction, in the first place, up the Republican Fork. After the time expired—and I do not complain of that—they chose to apply for an extension of time, and for authority to build their road in another direction. I have heard it stated—I think it was stated at the time and admitted, and I presume there is no doubt about it—that by that change, going by the Smoky Hill route as it is called, they obtained a very great advantage in the quality of the lands which they got on the new route. It is conceded that on that route are some of the finest lands in that region, and they had the benefit of them, and are having the benefit of them. They were at liberty, too, while having that increased benefit from changing their route, to take the whole subsidy which they would have received if they had joined the main road on the one hundredth meridian. We know from the application of another company what the Government may be exposed to in regard to that change of route.

The president of this company stated to me in conversation, and so did the engineer, that now they want an extension for some considerable distance further than this—I do not know how many miles—stating that they want to go where there are wood and water and iron. I inquired what they designed to do, and they told me, as it was perfectly manifest on the map they showed me, that in doing that they designed to make an entirely new road, bending southerly and having nothing to do with the main Pacific railroad, and they expected to get Government aid for that new railroad. Thus, instead of carrying out our system by this change, they must have contemplated originally making this application for additional subsidy, although they did not tell us of it when they got us to pass the bill giving them an extension, so that they might go by the Smoky Hill route, keeping it carefully concealed, for nothing was said on that subject. Now it is conceded that if this bill pass we shall have to pay nearly a million dollars more than they would have received if they had joined the main road on the one hundredth meridian. If we agree to this what shall we do next? Will they go out and join the main route? They will not do any such thing, but they will come to Congress and tease Congress, and we shall have a bill to allow them to go where they please.

Mr. HOWARD. Not with my consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it does not come from the Senator it will come from somebody else. It is manifest what the thing means. It means that we shall subsidize another road across the continent, and then there is to be still another, I suppose, south of that; and another is in progress to the north. Where is this to end? The original idea was that Government aid was to be given to build one railroad from the Mississippi river to California, and in order to accomplish that and to get that bill through, you had to have three months to it running through the States on this side, subsidizing them all. Now that we have done that, we are called upon to subsidize two or three more roads by Government aid. Cannot the country afford to wait? When there is one road across the continent, cannot the building of the others wait until the country develops so that they may be built by private enterprise with the aid of the lands alone, as these things have been done before?

What I see in it is an utter burdening of the Treasury for these railroads in addition to our heavy debt. I know what gentlemen say. They say it is developing the country and enabling us to pay taxes. They are looking forward a little too fast. The burden gets to be intolerable before the increased taxes come along to relieve us. That is the great difficulty. I am perfectly willing to comply with the first contract we made; but just look and see where Congress stands now and what is urged. Here is nearly a million dollars to be given to this railroad in addition to what we first agreed to pay, and another road claims two millions and a half for damages, and the committee are urging that claim because we have given this road a chance to change its route. All follows on that one first step. This is the first million. Then comes another and another. Sir, it is not dealing in good faith with Congress or with the nation, and I am utterly opposed to it.

Mr. STEWART. The granting of this has no tendency to commit the Government beyond the particular appropriation on the direct route to Denver; but when you look at your Indian appropriation bills and see what immense amounts of money you are expending to try to keep a quasi possession of that country, and when you take the report of every Army officer who has been there and who tells you that in the mere matter of Indian regulation it is cheaper to take possession of the country in this way, cheaper to build a military road and take hold of the country through the railroads than to expend millions upon millions yearly by trying to take care of the Indians—

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is always the argument.

Mr. STEWART. And a most conclusive argument. You spend millions of dollars every year upon the Indian service on the plains. You have the constant testimony of everybody capable of judging that it will be cheaper to take possession of the country by means of railroads than to continue your present system. You are at great disadvantage now in attempting to supply the Army and the Indian agencies out there. A fair, candid investigation of the subject will show that it would be better to build a northern and southern road, and take possession of the whole country. You are spending no money for Indians now on the line of the Omaha branch. You have it through to the Rocky mountains; you have the road through the Indian country, and that ends the question. You will have no more Indian wars there. It will civilize that portion of the country and keep possession of it. The present system of managing Indian affairs, all admit, is a great evil which can never be overcome until you extend railroads into that country. I need not go into details. The committee took no step which had a tendency to build a new continental road. This road now terminates upon a desert, and it is important that it should go where there are grass and water, and where it can make proper connections.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why is it that the company built the road to this point if they do not mean to continue it forty miles themselves? What did they begin for? They have called for these appropriations and got them all, and they then come to a point where they say they cannot stop and call on Congress to help them. Is the Government to build the road entirely?

Mr. STEWART. The company propose to build the road from the point named to Denver.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why do they not do it now?

Mr. STEWART. They have not the money to do it with. The road stops in the desert now. The question is not what is their interest, but what is the interest of the Government. The Government has spent this amount of money for a road stopping in the desert. Military men say that if we could get to a point where stock could be kept, where there is grass, where there is water, where the company can freight to New Mexico, it will be of vast importance. At Fort Wallace there is no place to keep stock, and it is a very great inconvenience to stop there. The military officers recommend this measure, and it is certainly for the interests of the Government. It would save a vast amount of freights going to New Mexico. This bill provides that the company shall build from the point named to Denver, and build from Denver to Cheyenne to connect with the Omaha branch. This extension is absolutely necessary in order to make the road of any value to anybody.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Maine is perfectly right in saying that we are not under any legal obligation, either express or implied, to grant additional subsidy to this road. The measure stands purely on its own merits. The question is whether it will be for the interest of the public to have it done. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad, after considering the subject maturely, thought it would be for the public interest to aid in the construction of this additional section of the road from the present terminus to the Wells, where it is said there is abundance of water and of grass. This has been recommended, I believe, by all the officers of the Army in that part of the country, and it is the point of divergence to Denver for the branch road originally contemplated by that company to that city. The bill therefore provides that the grant of lands may be extended to this branch of the Union Pacific, eastern division, from this point of divergence to the city of Denver, and then for a grant of land from the city of Denver to the city of Cheyenne on the Omaha line, so as to form a connection between the constructed part of this road and the Omaha branch of the Union Pacific railroad. There are a few miles necessary to be constructed in order to bring the terminus to an available point where our military trains can make their outfit for the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona. I believe the committee was entirely unanimous in agreeing that this amount of subsidy ought to be granted in order to secure the early completion of the road to this point. I think the Senator from Maine is right in stating that it is the purpose of the company ultimately to build the road on through New Mexico and Arizona to the Pacific coast, and I have no doubt the public interests will require that it shall be built at some time, and the earlier it be constructed the better for the public; but we are coming under no obligation, as it seems to me, either express or implied, to grant additional subsidy from Cheyenne Wells southwest. When that question shall arise it ought to stand on its own merits. I shall be disposed, as a member of this body, to consider it on its merits when it does arise. We do not now agree to any subsidy further than Cheyenne Wells.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is no question but what it would be a great advantage to have this road built. I do not suppose it is necessary for us to have the advice of the officers of the Army on that subject. I suppose the Senate will all agree with the committee that it is very desirable to have this road built, but that is not exactly the question as it presents itself to my mind. As I understand it, this company came to Congress and asked as a privilege that they might change their line to the point to which they have now arrived, having subsidies to that point. It seems to me that that does create an understanding and a contract between them and Congress that these are all the subsidies incident to that change of route. They get to that point and now ask for about seven hundred thousand dollars more.

Mr. COLE. The subsidy is not to exceed $32,000 per mile, and for forty miles that would be $1,280,000.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It may be $1,280,000. That is the maximum. I think it would be a wise experiment for Congress to refuse these subsidies and see if these roads will not put forth a little private enterprise, and not rely entirely on the Treasury of the nation to build their lines. It is perfectly clear that after they get to Cheyenne Wells, they will apply again for other subsidies; no one doubts that; and it is a question now to be settled at this late period of the session whether the whole policy of this nation shall be changed and we shall have two or three routes across the continent to be built by drafts upon the public Treasury rather than adhere to the policy which was deliberately adopted and which was a liberal policy. To take this course in the present state of the Treasury, I think, is unauthorized and improper.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in relation to this subject. I think the greatest mistake Congress has made in relation to this railroad matter was in permitting this company to go on the Smoky Hill route at all. That was, in the first place, a violation of the faith which Congress had pledged to those companies that undertook to build branches and concentrate on the one hundredth meridian. The purpose of Congress was to concentrate the whole railroad interest east of the Missouri river, in carrying through the Pacific railroad in one line after reaching the one hundredth meridian. In order to concentrate them Congress allowed three branches to meet at that point, one coming from St. Louis and Kansas City, another coming from Chicago by way of Quincy and Burlington, and the other coming from Chicago directly west through the State of Iowa, striking at Omaha. The purpose was to concentrate the whole railroad interest, bring them together on the one hundredth meridian in order to construct the road, to begin with, and then, while it is just as material as the construction of the road, to be able to run it after it should be constructed—for I tell you on the line across to California there are nearly a thousand miles of desert; and when the road is done it is to be a very serious question whether it will pay the expenses of running; and therefore the necessity of having all the railroad interests of the East concentrate their whole force over one line. But this allowing the thing to be divided across these plains into two roads running over a barren region of country, where, for five hundred miles, there is neither timber nor scarcely water, and no way business except in the transportation of supplies to the troops and supplies to the Indians, is not advisable.

It is going to be, in my judgment, a very serious question whether the road, when constructed, will pay the expenses of running across this vast region of country. But it involved this other difficulty: by running up the Smoky Hill this line went directly through the home of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, where they were in the habit of living in the winter time in the little timber that clusters along the streams of the Smoky Hill, and drove them out from that place, which, I say, has kept them afloat, and kept them at war with us.

But, Mr. President, aside from that it has involved us with the central branch, as it is called. We agreed that the central branch, starting from Atchison, might run into the Pacific railroad on the one hundredth meridian. Our faith, it seems to me, has become bound, and we, by consenting that the road with which they were to connect should turn off down to the Smoky Hill, have in substance consented that they shall have the benefit of the original contract, and that they may be permitted to build to the point of junction with the one hundredth meridian. By that we are bound; but we are under no implied obligation or anything binding on our faith in any way whatever to give this further subsidy. I do not feel disposed to vote this additional subsidy. But I shall not take up the time of the Senate on the last day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I called attention to this matter because I thought it was due to the Senate that they should understand the question involved in this amendment. I voted for the amendment in committee and I shall vote for it here, and will state to the Senate briefly the reason. I have opposed during this session the increase of subsidies to railroads. On that general principle I have acted throughout. When application was made by the eastern division for a subsidy to go by the way of Albuquerque, I voted against it, and am still opposed to it. The difficulty they had to encounter was this: Congress had allowed them to build a road on the Smoky Hill route. If that was to be done over again I do not know that I should vote for any departure from the original railroad grant; but that is a question neither here nor there. They built the road to the termination of their present subsidy, which is an inconvenient and unascertained point; and it is impossible to ascertain it exactly for the reasons I stated a few moments ago. The general weight of the testimony and the opinion of the United States officers is that it terminates about Fort Wallace, in a place admitted to be inconvenient, without water, on an arid plain, in the State of Kansas, where no connections can be made. Under these circumstances, this road, having been denied further subsidies by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, having been refused their application to extend their road southwesterly to Albuquerque, applied to us to fix the termination of their subsidy. There were two ways to fix it. One was by the survey of the Republican route and ascertaining the length of the Republican route, and then ascertaining the point at which their subsidy would terminate on that route. That was a very difficult question.

On the other hand, all the officers of the Government, including the General of the Army, General Sherman, General Schofield, General Sheridan, and all the officers familiar with that country, who fought over it in Indian wars, and have been over it recently, agree that the best point for the termination of the eastern division road is Cheyenne Wells, because there is grass and there is water; it is an old and familiar camping ground known since the early settlements on the plains, a prominent point in Colorado. Then this company applied to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to allow them to terminate the subsidy for their road at Cheyenne Wells. That involved an increase of subsidy for about forty miles. At first I was disinclined to do it; but in connection with the other provisions of this bill, I have concluded that it is wise and prudent and economical in the Government to grant this subsidy. What are they? This company undertake to build without any cash subsidy, with the ordinary land grant, the road from Cheyenne Wells to Denver City, a distance of between a hundred and fifty and two hundred miles. If they will do this, they will open railroad communication with Denver and Colorado, and with all the mining region of that country; they will enable us to reach by this railroad the fortifications along the line of the Arkansas, and on the road to Albuquerque, so that according to the opinion of General Sherman and General Schofield, we shall save in transportation to the forts in New Mexico and other places by the construction of this railroad several times the interest of the increased subsidy. That was their testimony, and the figures seemed to be very conclusive.

In addition to that a company chartered by the Territory of Colorado undertake to build a road from Denver City to Cheyenne, a point on the line of the main Pacific road, and thus we shall have accomplished with but an increased subsidy for forty miles the connection contemplated by the original acts and a route along the Smoky Hill and thence to the main Pacific railroad. If that can be accomplished by an additional subsidy of forty or forty-five miles, I think it will be economical in the Government to grant it.

This bill does not raise in the least the question of the application made by this same company for a subsidy to build a railroad to Albuquerque and so on by the southern Pacific route to California. In my judgment it rather tends to make an argument against that, because the strong point they now make for an increased subsidy is that they are left in the wilderness without any connection or any terminus; but if by this bill they have a terminus at a point selected by themselves at Cheyenne Wells, and are under obligations to build their road from Denver and from Denver to make connection with the Union Pacific railroad this side of the desert, the very strong argument for an increased subsidy is gone, and the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin is completely answered. He says that two roads ought not to be built over the desert. By this bill only one road will be built over the desert, and we shall give the eastern division an opportunity to make connection with the main Pacific railroad this side of the Black Hills. Thus his argument is completely answered.

While generally I am indisposed to vote for such bills, and have no particular feeling about this matter, I believe as a matter of economy it will be better to enable this railroad to get a terminus at Denver by giving the additional subsidy for forty miles and enable them to get a connection with the main Pacific railroad; and in this way, in my judgment, we shall settle the controversy about the Central branch, because the Central branch have complained that we have diverted the eastern division so as to prevent them having a connection with the main Pacific railroad; but if this connection is perfected to Cheyenne Wells and Denver, and thence to Cheyenne City, they can run their road upon the original line into the eastern division, and they will have a complete connection not only with the main Pacific railroad, but also with Colorado, which will be a great advantage to them, and carry out the original purpose, and they will have a road reaching to Pike's Peak and the mining region. It seems to me that under all the circumstances it is better to pass this bill, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to make one statement, which may have a certain weight upon the mind of Senators in reference to this bill. It is this: the eastern division, although somewhat embarrassed in its operations, has really repaid to the Government all the interest which the Government has paid on the bonds that have been issued to the company, and something more. This eastern division branch is the only branch that has done that; and indeed, the Union Pacific Railroad Company proper has not, I believe, repaid to the Government in the shape of transportation, &c., quite one half of the interest upon the bonds issued to it, which interest has been paid by the Government; so that the eastern division has this great advantage before the world, that it has kept its credit perfectly good with the Government; and I have no reason to apprehend that in the future it will run in arrears in the payment of interest.

I do not wish to protract the discussion, but I beg to be indulged in saying that I in a great degree concur in the view taken of this subject by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. I do not look upon it as a perfectly settled question that this enterprise will be a money making one for the Government or the country across the main branch. I look upon that immense desert spreading itself between the two ranges of mountains both on the route of the Omaha line and on the route of the line upon the thirty-fifth degree, which is in contemplation, as entirely experimental still, and I am not prepared by any means to say now that I will hereafter give my consent to granting a subsidy to a line on the thirty-fifth degree of latitude. I do not know what may turn up in the future; but I hold my opinions in abeyance on that question. The effect of the passage of this bill will be absolutely to insure, as I have the best reason to believe, the completion of the line from Cheyenne Wells through Denver to the city of Cheyenne on the Omaha branch, and with all commendable speed. It will insure it absolutely, as I have no doubt; and this measure is entirely separate and independent from the contemplated enterprise of building a road along the thirty-fifth degree of latitude. The two things are entirely independent of each other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the Senator a question. It seems this company cannot build for want of means this forty miles. Then how are they going to build the other part of the road?

Mr. DRAKE. There is power here to mortgage that portion of the road west of Cheyenne Wells.

Mr. HOWARD. They will raise money by means of a mortgage which this bill authorizes. Their means will be sufficient; and besides, they have every inducement in the world to complete the line.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask whether, if this subsidy is granted so that this road is constructed by Denver to Cheyenne, that will settle our difficulty with the central branch? Will they turn their road into the Smoky Hill route, so that we can settle that question of their claim on the Government?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not see that this has any relation to that question at all.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If we could settle the difficulty with the central branch, if they would turn their road and go into the Smoky Hill route, and go that way on to the main railroad at Cheyenne, it would be an argument for this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The central branch can then make their connection at the very point they contemplated making it and make their connection with the Pacific railroad. They always contemplated making their connection with the eastern division east of Fort Riley; and if we pass this bill they can carry out their original design and run their line into the eastern division and have their connection, which ought to be always claimed, with the Pacific railroad.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Ohio must know better than that; they have got beyond Fort Riley now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know they have; but they can make their connection with this railroad and make connection with the Union Pacific.

Mr. HOWARD. They will have a clear right to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If they do not it will be their own fault.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not want anybody to be misled about that. This road diverges off to the southwest, which will render it perfectly impracticable for the central branch to connect with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate will see that this road does not go to the southwest until it gets to Fort Riley, and the central branch was bound to make connection east of Fort Riley, and can do it.

Mr. HARLAN. The central branch has now built west of the meridian of Fort Riley. They will have to turn around and come back considerably east of the present terminus, and to make this connection they would have to build a long parallel road, perhaps equal in length to making connection with the original point at the one hundredth meridian. The claim of the central branch stands on its own merits, and so must this. The committee thought it would be wise to give this company an additional credit to enable them to hasten the completion of their road to the Cheyenne Wells, a place where it will be convenient to make outfits, where there is plenty of grass and water; that the public convenience required that they should be stimulated to make it thus far; but it will not relieve the obligation of the Government to carry out the original understanding with the central branch in my opinion.

Mr. CONKLING. We see now very clearly that this is a matter which ought not to be disposed of in a moment, and I wish upon two points that have been suggested to make a remark.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Before the Senate goes on I wish to suggest that this bill be laid aside for a few moments in order that we may present morning business. I have a number of papers to present, but I gave way this morning to the Senator from Missouri, expecting that the bill which he called up would occupy but a short time. It is leading to debate, and I suggest that it be passed over informally, and that we go on with the morning business. I have waited for an hour.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no wish to interfere with the convenience of anybody.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask that the bill be laid aside, that we may present the morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Is there any objection to the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none. The bill is laid aside temporarily.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BUCKALEW presented a petition of citizens of Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, praying that pensions be granted to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and to the widows of such as have died; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that pensions be granted to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and to the widows of such as have died; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of employes of the Lehigh Zinc Company's oxide works at South Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the renewal of the patent of Samuel T. Jones for the manufacture of oxide of zinc; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I also present a memorial of A. J. Marshall, on the ventilation of the two Halls of Congress. This memorial, with the accompanying papers, contains some very interesting matter. I move that the papers be laid on the table and printed, with a view to having the subject considered at the next session of Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD presented the petition of Normand Wiard, praying that Government manufactories may be abolished and that such manufactured articles as may be required for the use of the Government be purchased; which was referred to the joint Committee on Ordnance.

Mr. HOWE presented a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the Committee on Claims, inclosing copies of papers relative to the petition of Margaret Doyle.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. VAN WINKLE, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Harriet W. Pond have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the private papers filed with the application for a change of register of the brig Highland Mary.

PALEMON JOHN.

Mr. BUCKALEW. House bill No. 453, relating to the claim of Palemon John, a former assessor of internal revenue in Pennsylvania, was passed some days since, and I entered a motion to reconsider. I desire to say that I have examined all the papers since the passage of the bill, and I find there is only one defect in the case. I allude to this now because the case arises in my own district. The amount of stamps which it is alleged Mr. John returned to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is proved only by his own oath. That is a point to which I have directed my attention. The evidence is very satisfactory that he mailed stamps directed to the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue at the post office at Bloomsburg. The postmaster swears to that fact, and the fact is indisputable. It also appears very clearly by the investigations which were made under the direction of the Postmaster General that that registered letter was purloined from the mails, or lost somewhere between Bloomsburg and Philadelphia. It seems, also, that another letter sent the day following by the postmaster there, notifying the postmaster at Washington city of the mailing of this registered letter, never reached its destination. It appears probable, in fact I believe from the papers, that both these letters, the letter transmitting the stamps and the letter of advice from the postmaster at Bloomsburg to the postmaster at Washington, were purloined from the mails after they left Bloomsburg, having been mailed there.

Under these circumstances, although the oath of the claimant alone fixes the amount of stamps which he mailed, it seems reasonably clear that he did mail about the amount which he states. That was exactly the balance necessary to close his account, some seven hundred dollars. He is a man of credit and veracity, and swears to the fact; and now, under an amendment of the laws of the United States, introduced by myself, he would be admitted in the Federal courts on his oath as a witness, even in a case where he was a party. Upon examining his account at the internal revenue department, I think there is such moral certainty in the case that I am willing to withdraw my motion to reconsider, and let the bill stand passed, although I acknowledge that in ordinary cases it would be very hazardous, indeed, to permit a party to get a claim through on his own oath.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, leave will be granted to withdraw the motion to reconsider. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1131) regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases for the protection of officers and agents of the Government, and for the better defense of the Treasury against unlawful claims, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs-at-law of Thomas Lawson, reported a bill (S. No. 647) for the relief of the heirs of the late Thomas Lawson, deceased; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. THAYER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 640) to provide for the payment of subsistence furnished for the Navajo Indians, reported it without amendment.

Mr. THAYER. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1875) to transfer to the Department of the Interior certain powers and duties now exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with Indian affairs, have directed me to report it back with an amendment. I have been specially requested by the delegation from North Carolina, now present, to ask the Senate to consider the bill at this time. Nobody objects to it, and it will have to go back to the other House for concurrence in our amendment. It simply transfers jurisdiction over the fragment of the Cherokee Indians left in North Carolina from the Treasury to the Interior Department. The bill is introduced on the special recommendation of both the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

MR. HOWARD. I hope we shall go on with the railroad bill, which is regularly under consideration.

MR. THAYER. We are on morning business now. There can be no objection to this bill, and it has to go back to the other House.

MR. HOWARD. Let us go on with the railroad bill.

MR. THAYER. I ask if there is any objection to the consideration of this bill.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Michigan to object.

MR. HOWARD. Yes, sir. If we can proceed with the railroad bill now under consideration I do object.

MR. THAYER. That was laid aside informally. This would have been through before this time.

MR. CONKLING. I understand that the Senators from North Carolina ask for the passage of this bill, and it is a formal matter to which there is no objection.

MR. HOWARD. If it does not lead to any discussion I shall not object.

MR. THAYER. If there be any objection or discussion I shall consent that it lie on the table.

MR. HOWARD. Very well.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 1875) to transfer to the Department of the Interior certain powers and duties now exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with Indian affairs was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the powers and duties devolving upon the Secretary of the Treasury, under and by virtue of the fourth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes," approved July 29, 1848, and the powers and duties devolving upon him under and by virtue of the laws relating to the investment of the moneys in behalf of the Cherokee Indians, from the sales of land under the treaties concluded at Pontotoc October 20, 1822, and at Washington city May 24, 1834, as also all other supervisory and appellate powers and duties in regard to Indian affairs, which may now by law be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, shall hereafter the passage be exercised and performed by the Secretary of the Department of the Interior.

The amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to add the following additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a new roll or census to be made of the North Carolina or Eastern Cherokees, which shall be the roll upon which payments due said Indians shall be made.

And be it further enacted, That hereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to take the same supervisory charge of the Eastern or North Carolina Cherokees as of other tribes of Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LANMAN'S DICTIONARY.

MR. BUCKALEW submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase for the use of each Senator one copy of the fifth, being the latest, edition of "Lanman's Dictionary of the United States Congress and the General Government," and one copy each for the offices of the Secretary, of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and of the Postmaster of the Senate.

DENVER PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MR. TRUMBULL. A few days ago I presented to the Senate a resolution in regard to the pay of new Senators. Some action ought to be taken upon it. I presented it in accordance with former precedents of the Senate. I ask that it be disposed of. It ought to be disposed of in some way. It is about the last day of the session. Of course they are entitled to some pay, and the question ought to be settled.

MR. DRAKE. The bill that was before the Senate was laid aside informally for the accommodation of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I now desire that it shall be proceeded with.

MR. TRUMBULL. Will not the Senator from Missouri allow this resolution to be disposed of in some way?

MR. DRAKE. This bill can be disposed of in a little time, if the Senate will allow it to be proceeded with.

MR. TRUMBULL. This is a matter that affects members of the body, and I do not think there ought to be any objection to disposing of it in some way.

MR. DRAKE. I do not propose to interfere with that matter; but it is a question that depends entirely upon our own action, and it can be disposed of at any time during this day; but this bill if passed by the Senate this morning must go to the House of Representatives, and I therefore insist on proceeding with it.

MR. TRUMBULL. The resolution could have been disposed of by this time.

MR. DRAKE. I call for the resumption of the consideration of the pending bill that was laid aside informally.

MR. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I ask permission of the Senator, who has charge of that bill, to allow me to put on its passage a joint resolution which it is necessary should go through the House to-day. It is a joint resolution from the Committee on Retrenchment, which looks to the setting aside of a fraudulent contract on the part of the Interior Department for stationery.

MR. DRAKE. I do not wish to be discourteous to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire.

MR. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. If it leads to any discussion I shall not press it.

MR. DRAKE. I feel great interest in the consideration of the bill before the Senate, and I ask that the Senate resume the consideration of it.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. No. 570) for a grant of land, granting the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and for other purposes, was laid aside informally, and being called for is now regularly before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The pending question is on the amendment of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, as amended, to insert what has been read as the second section.

MR. CONKLING. I feel inclined, upon the suggestion made first by the Senator from Ohio, to favor the passage of this bill; and I wish to assign a reason or two in answer to what was said by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator from Wisconsin, if I understand him, charges to the account of the eastern division an equity that he thinks has arisen in behalf of the central branch, and upon the ground that the eastern division being bound to go by a certain route the central branch relied upon that route and built a road which might have been connected with the eastern division but for the diversion which took place under the permission of Congress. This proposition suggests to everybody acquainted with the subject the propriety of a somewhat careful consideration, which I beg to assure Senators I do not intend to give it on my part this morning, but it gives rise to a matter of fact also, which I think can be disposed of within very narrow limits, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to that matter of fact.

It is not true historically or in any other way that the central branch built its present road relying upon the route of the eastern division as established before it went up the Smoky Hill. I have in my hand the evidence that on the 21st day of February, 1866, the president of the Pacific railroad, eastern division, addressed to the then Secretary of the Interior, the honorable Senator from Iowa, a letter giving notice formally that the original intention, as far as it had existed, to go up the Republican Fork was abandoned; and let me say just here that that purpose was formed a long time before, and long before the war interrupted this work, and interrupted surveys. On the day which I have fixed notice was given, as I have said, to the Secretary of the Interior. At that time no considerable portion of the Central Branch railroad had been built, as I have in my hands also the proof to show, and I will refer to it in a moment. A certain portion of the road had been graded, and a map had been filed by both companies. When the war concluded and working parties were enabled to go out the eastern division saw that another route was preferable to that, and proposed to file a map accordingly. The Attorney General, in an opinion which lies upon my desk, held that in point of time they were too late by some six months, because the law had fixed the limit, and the time had run, and he advised that legislation was necessary to cure this difficulty in matter of time. That legislation did not take place until a day later than that of which I am speaking.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is reminded of an omission which he made. The Chair should have called up at the close of the morning hour the unfinished business of yesterday, the bill concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States.

MR. CONNESS. I agree to have that laid over informally until this bill has been disposed of.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be laid aside informally, and the consideration of Senate bill No. 570 continued. The Senator from New York will proceed.

MR. CONKLING. I was about to say that although the legislation which enabled the eastern division to go up the Smoky Hill was not until July afterward, the record of the debates will show that at the time of which I am speaking, February, 1866, all parties connected with this central branch, the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] being then its president, perfectly well understood that the Eastern Division railroad was not to be built up the Republican Fork, but that it was to be built where, in truth, it has been built. So that Senators who attend to my statement and will take the trouble to verify it will see that in point of fact no assertion is more entirely ungrounded than the assertion that the central branch laid down its track and expended its money expecting to obtain a connection with the eastern division in consequence of that road going up the Republican Fork. So far from that, a letter which I have in my hand from the Secretary of the Treasury states that on the 12th of July, 1866, five months after the central branch company had notice and understood that the eastern division was to come up the Smoky Hill, and not up the Republican Fork, but twenty miles of the Atchison and Pike's Peak road, otherwise called the central branch, were completed and accepted by the commissioners, and I have read the report of the commissioners which I have at my desk. I will not stop to read it to the Senate, but it will show to Senators precisely how much work in addition to that had been done five months after the period when they had full notice of all the facts. Therefore without dwelling upon it, and without being able in the brief time I mean to occupy to state it as circumstantially as I should like to do, I lay out of the question the blame which the Senator from Wisconsin imputes to the eastern division for anything which has befallen the central branch, and I come to the second point, upon which I wish to make an observation suggested by the Senator from Ohio.

I do think, although the Senator from Michigan thinks otherwise, that a decided argument is to be drawn in favor of the bill before us from the fact that it will supply to the central branch all that the central branch can honestly insist it ever expected. Why? The central branch is the assignee of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, which company had the right to extend its road—that was the language of the law—from St. Joseph onward under a charter which went to Pike's Peak. It was the Atchison and Pike's Peak railroad. That charter did not call for a road running west; it called for a route bearing decidedly to the south, and running as the central branch laid it down on its map, not where it runs now, not even to Manhattan, but to Topeka, where it would have had its connection within its one hundred miles, as the Senator from Ohio says, east of Fort Riley. It was there they were to go.

Having been told by some of these gentlemen that I did them injustice in some remarks which I made formerly on this subject, I have taken the pains to traverse the debates since; and I wish time permitted me to present them to Senators in order that they might see that the friends of the eastern division, its representatives on this floor, when a subsidy for one hundred miles was given to it admitted and insisted that they were to go to a point on the eastern division east of Fort Riley; that there was no expectation of going anywhere else, and that so far from one hundred miles of subsidy not being sufficient sixty miles of subsidy was all they would ask, and that those sixty miles would carry them to the connection which they sought and coveted, being a connection east, and far east of Fort Riley. Now, this company has changed entirely its route and has run not only west but northwest, having run to a point which as I can show by its sworn map, which I have in the Chamber, verified by their engineer, would not enable them to make a connection with the eastern division had it gone up the Republican Fork by fifty miles, although my honorable friend from Kansas told me when I said so before that I might as well say that it was fifty miles from Albany to Troy, that it was not fifteen miles. I say to him now that I have the sworn evidence on my desk of this company, laid down on the map by townships, showing that had the eastern division gone up the Republican Fork by the route which the central branch has taken, they could not have made their connection within their hundred miles by more than forty miles, and showing that by the law they could not have made it by more than sixty miles. As I speak in the presence of gentlemen who understand this matter, I wish to explain my last remark.

The extension was to be from St. Joseph, not to exceed one hundred miles. In place of extending it there they commenced at Atchison, twenty-one miles from St. Joseph, gaining twenty-one miles to start with, and then they ran one hundred miles from there, and the extension of those one hundred miles leaves them more than forty miles short of any connection with the eastern division, no matter where it had gone, unless it had defied mountains and clambered bluffs. And yet we are told that there is an equity which compels us to take up the central branch at the extension of their hundred miles, and build, in the first place, for them these forty miles of road which nobody pretends a subsidy was ever granted for, and then carry it on indefinitely to the one hundredth degree.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio that when we pass this bill we confer upon the central branch, not the right, but the favor, in substance which they seek; we give them a connection with the main trunk, ultimately, of the Pacific railroad. But some Senator remarked, I think the Senator from Iowa, that they had already pushed their road west of Fort Riley. Very well, sir; if they have pushed their road west of Fort Riley, it will compel them, perhaps, to take up their iron, if they have actually laid it down, for a short space and turn their road down where, and where alone, it had a right to go, namely, to a connection with the eastern division at some point east of Fort Riley; and it is no answer to say that without authority of law, in derogation of the pledges and promises under which they received their hundred miles of subsidy, they have pointed their western terminus so far north and carried it so far beyond the meridian of Fort Riley that it has now become inconvenient for them to make the connection to which they are entitled. I therefore deny that any deflection of the eastern division at Fort Riley did change, or could change at all the rights of the central branch. The one hundred miles to which they were restricted carried them to a point east of Fort Riley, and could not, by any possibility, permit them to go west of it; and up to the point of Fort Riley nobody pretends that the location of the eastern division is anything excepting just what and where it should be.

In the second place, I concur with the Senator from Ohio that we do confer substantial benefit upon the Central Branch Pacific road by restoring to them virtually that very connection which they insist upon it they lost, which I deny that they have lost, because they did not embrace their opportunity to enjoy it; and it restores to them that connection which they say now they want, and therefore, and because this termination at Cheyenne Wells is recommended by the officers of the Army acquainted with the facts, and for the reasons I have already given, I am willing and glad to vote for it, hoping that it will be a solution of this whole question, and that when we have done it we shall not have seriously pressed upon us the proposition to give two and a half millions of money and nineteen hundred thousand acres of land to this other company, for which I am unable to see now the shadow of an equity; for which certainly there will be no pretext when we give them the connection which this bill proposes.

Mr. DRAKE. I do very earnestly hope that we shall not drift off into a discussion upon the bill with regard to the Central Branch Pacific railroad, which is not before us. Beyond all doubt, in the view taken by the Senator from New York, it was perfectly proper for him to state that matter; but I would deprecate, very respectfully, any pursuing of that line of debate, and would beg that we may have a vote upon the bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to occupy only a moment to correct the statement of facts made by the Senator from New York. I will not delay the passage of the bill if the Senate desire to pass it. The Senator from New York seems to be troubled about the central branch on almost every occasion. It haunts him when he lies down and when he gets up. The fact is that the contract for the building of their road was made in July, 1865, for one hundred miles, instead of in 1866, as the Senator said.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not say anything about the contract; I simply referred to the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing when the first twenty miles were completed.

Mr. POMEROY. In July, 1866, forty miles of iron were laid, and sixty miles were graded. The direction of this road is precisely on the parallel from Atchison to Pike's Peak, the first standard parallel by the surveyors commencing at Atchison, and running due west, and instead of deflecting south, to go to Pike's Peak, they do not deflect south a township anywhere to reach Pike's Peak in a direct line.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator mean to say that a line due west from Atchison would reach Pike's Peak without deflecting to the south?

Mr. POMEROY. Without deflecting a township, six miles. There is only one other point on which I desire to say a word. The connection to be made was to be made in the Republican valley. No one doubts that. Before the passage of the act there was a consideration urged here, and I urged it myself during the pendency of the bill, that there might be an early connection made in the Kansas valley, but in that I was voted down by a yea and nay vote, and one hundred miles of subsidy given to make connection in the valley of the Republican. If you count the townships from Atchison straight west you come to the Republican valley within two and a half townships from Atchison, but in building a road one hundred miles of road are not a hundred miles in a straight line. I said that a hundred miles in a straight line from Atchison by way of this road brought us within twelve or fifteen miles of the Republican valley. It is so in a straight line by counting the townships not in the bend of the Republican above where they now propose to go.

Mr. CONKLING. My statement was that from the western end of the Central branch as it is now, to a connection with the Republican fork was at least forty miles. The Senator told me that I was wrong about that, that I might as well say it was forty miles from Albany to Troy; that it was fifteen miles. Now, my statement is that the sworn map of this company which I have shows that it is over forty miles.

Mr. POMEROY. The Republican river branches off to the South, and where they now propose to construct it is further than in a straight line from Atchison. This is true; but what I said was that a hundred miles in a direct line west from Atchison brought us within twelve or fifteen miles of the valley, and it is a matter of fact about which there can be no dispute, because it is all laid down on the map.

But, sir, I will not occupy time. I only wish to say that this bill, independent of the claim of the Central branch, stands on its own merits, and ought to be voted upon on its own merits.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. DRAKE. Let us vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee has been agreed to, and the question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment as amended, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, may mortgage that part of its road between the point where its subsidy in bonds shall terminate and Denver City, together with its rolling stock, to an amount not exceeding $32,000 per mile, which point shall be held and construed under existing laws to be at or near Cheyenne Wells, in Colorado, not further west than the meridian of said wells; and the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company may mortgage its road and rolling stock to a like amount, for the purpose of enabling said companies to borrow money to construct their said roads.

Mr. MORGAN. I had hoped that we should not be called upon to vote any more subsidies at this session of Congress. There have been several bills presented for subsidies to railroads, and this is one of them. The Senate ought to understand that it is the entering wedge of a new line to California to be supported by the Government, and we ought to vote with that understanding. The distance to be built under this bill, fifty miles, is probably as much as can be constructed this year; but if we grant this aid now we shall be called upon at the next session of Congress to grant additional aid, because as long as Congress will grant the railroads will apply. It is much more convenient and agreeable to the stockholders to have the Government build the roads than for them to advance the money from their own private fortunes. This is a bill granting near a million dollars, at least eight hundred thousand to this line. It is a new subsidy to that extent.

Mr. WILSON. I desire, Mr. President, to make a statement in regard to this question. All our difficulties on this subject grow out of the change two years ago that was made by our allowing this eastern division to go down to the Smoky Hill route. We have had a great deal of difficulty growing out of it. Now it is proposed, and I assented to the proposal, that this road shall go to Cheyenne Wells with a view of going to Denver, and not to the Pacific, and I support this bill with that understanding. I hold in my hand a protest of the president of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company against allowing this road to diverge southward, and I shall vote for the report of the committee with the expectation, if there is any truth in men, that this eastern division company shall build their road to Denver, and that the Congress of the United States by this vote, instead of doing anything to carry this road to New Mexico or to the Pacific, gives a vote to the contrary of that. I vote with that understanding, and intend to be governed by it in the future. If there is to be another railroad to the Pacific, that railroad belongs to the south of this eastern division, and it should be some distance south of it. I shall vote for the bill with the understanding I have stated.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad was to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not take effect and go into operation until the said Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, shall, by a vote of its directors, have given its consent to the same, and have filed a certificate to that effect under the corporate seal of said company, attested by its president and secretary, in the Department of the Interior. And the grant herein made to said Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company are made upon condition that said company shall complete and put in operation its whole line of railroad and telegraph by the 1st day of January, A. D. 1870.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in the act of Congress approved July 3, 1866, relating to the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, shall deprive the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, assignee of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, of its right to continue its road and telegraph line westerly from the termination of the one hundred miles mentioned in the act of Congress incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, approved July 1, 1862, to a connection with the Union Pacific Railroad Company, as one of the branches thereof; but said Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company shall continue its road westerly from the termination of the one hundred miles aforesaid to a connection with the Union Pacific railroad at the hundredth meridian of west longitude, upon the same terms and conditions, in all respects, as are now provided by law for the construction of the Union Pacific railroad. And in case said Central Branch Company shall deem it desirable, it may construct its road so as to connect with the Omaha branch of the Union Pacific railroad at any nearer point east of said meridian: Provided, That no subsidy in United States bonds shall be allowed to said Central Branch Company for any greater length of road than one hundred and fifty miles from the termination of the one hundred miles, on which bonds are already authorized to be issued on said line of railroad.

I will say for the information of the Senate that this amendment is the bill which has been before us before, and been repeatedly under discussion, for the benefit of the Central branch which has been spoken of. I offer it as an amendment to this bill in order to test the sense of the Senate upon the propriety of granting the relief which is asked for by the Central Branch Company. I do not wish to make it a subject of discussion further.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator of course understands that it will be the subject of a very prolonged discussion. He cannot doubt that.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us vote on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Michigan has substantially in his hands the fate of the pending bill, which he knows has been fully considered and adjusted with a view to enable the eastern division to have a western terminus. It is manifest that this attempt to hitch on the central branch to this bill is a defeat of the bill, and any Senator here has it in his power to defeat both measures. My own impression is that the bill we have now perfected will enable the eastern division to go on without a subsidy beyond Cheyenne Wells and build their road to Denver, and thence to Cheyenne City; that it is a measure not only largely in the interest of the local community there, Colorado and New Mexico, but largely in the interest of the Government. Now, to put on this disputed proposition for a local road in no way connected with this, but rather disconnected from it, going in a different direction, is simply to defeat this bill about which I believe there is a general concurrence of sentiment. The Senator can, by pressing this amendment and raising a debate upon it, defeat the whole, and that will be the result. This is the last legislative day, and we must go into executive session within a few minutes. I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment, because, if not, we might as well go into executive session at once, and let the whole thing go.

Mr. HOWARD. I certainly would not by any means embarrass the passage of the bill by the amendment which I have offered; much less would I defeat the passage of that bill; but I beg leave to say that if the Senate will come to an understanding that we shall have a vote upon the bill itself, which I have now offered as an amendment during the day, I shall be very happy to withdraw it. I think we ought to take a vote on that bill.

Mr. CONKLING. We cannot have any such understanding.

Mr. CONNESS, (to Mr. HOWARD.) Withdraw your amendment and try to bring up the bill itself.

Mr. STEWART. Several Senators will not vote for this proposition as an amendment who will vote for it as an original bill.

Mr. HOWARD. There seems to be an indisposition on the part of the Senate to entertain this amendment at present, and I withdraw it, with the understanding that the Senate will take up the bill for discussion if we have an opportunity during the day.

Mr. CONKLING. There can be no such understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRAGIN. Before the vote is taken, I wish to state that on this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS. He would vote against the bill and I for it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On this question I agreed to pair off with the honorable Senator from West Virginia, Mr. VAN WINKLE. He would vote for the bill and I against it.

Mr. SUMNER. On this vote I have paired with the Senator from Vermont, Mr. MORRILL, he being against the bill and I for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Drake, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Nye, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Welch, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, McCreery, Morgan, and Patterson of Tennessee—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Whyte—25.

So the bill was passed.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULES.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses be suspended for the residue of the session.

The joint rules referred to are as follows:

"16. No bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the last three days of the session.

"17. No bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approval on the last day of the session."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions of the Senate:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 147) for the relief of Jonathan S. Turner;

A bill (S. No. 209) to incorporate "The Evening Star Newspaper Company";

A bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of Eliza Mascher, widow of John F. Mascher; and

A bill (S. No. 540) to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia.

The message further announced that the House had passed the resolution of the Senate (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (H. R. No. 358) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish cannon to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Pequannock and Paterson, New Jersey; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1451) for the relief of John H. Osler, of Guernsey county, Ohio, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 1450) for the more speedy reorganization of the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that bill will be put on its passage.

Mr. CONNESS. Not now.

Mr. STEWART. It is important that it should be passed.

Several Senators. Not now.

Mr. STEWART. Well, let it lie on the table without a reference.

The bill was ordered to lie on the table.

CENTRAL BRANCH PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I move now to take up Senate bill No. 256, relating to the Central Branch Pacific railroad.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONNESS. Is not the unfinished business in order unless it be set aside by a vote? I call for the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That does not supersede the motion to take up the other bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to know whether the bill to which I have reference, the bill for the protection of American citizens abroad, does not come up in the natural order of things, and whether it does not require a vote to put it aside?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly it does.

Mr. CONNESS. It is the regular order, and before the Senate, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But a motion is made to supersede it and take up another bill.

Mr. CONNESS. It is the unfinished business, and has been lying over informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Michigan is before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. The unfinished business was before the Senate half an hour ago and laid over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Any Senator has a right to move to lay it aside and take up something else.

Mr. CONKLING. But the motion is not to put it aside. Let the Senator make that motion if he chooses.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very anxious to get up the bill relative to the central branch, and to get the sense of the Senate upon it.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall vote against the Senator if he takes this course.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not care about that. I move to take up Senate bill No. 256.

Mr. CONNESS. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make one remark on this motion. The Senator from Michigan understands, of course, that I am not the only member of the body who wishes to submit remarks, somewhat at length, upon the central branch bill; and I say to the Senator that, reluctant as I am to occupy time at this stage of the session, if he persists in taking up the bill I shall feel at liberty to debate it without regard to the lateness of the session. Since it was up before I have examined the whole question very carefully, and before a vote is taken upon it I intend to put upon the record, and deliberately, my objections to it. Now, if the Senator thinks anything is to be gained on the last legislative day by taking up a bill which will certainly lead to a long discussion, and would lead to discussion even if I were to hold my peace, so be it. I submit to him that without advancing the bill it will simply fritter away the day.

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand the motion to be to postpone the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly. To postpone the special order. The Senator from California calls for the special order—

Mr. CONNESS. Which is the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to put that aside, and to take up Senate bill No. 256.

Mr. HOWE. I only wish to say that I shall vote against putting aside the unfinished business, but I do not understand that the bill alluded to by the Senator from California is the unfinished business.

Mr. CONNESS. It has been so decided by the Chair.

Mr. HOWE. We shall see about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, to take up Senate bill No. 256.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say one word to the Senate before the vote is taken. For two weeks past I have urged the bill constituting the unfinished business on the attention of the Senate. We are now in the last day in this session. It is a subject I submit that we should legislate upon before we adjourn. There is no more discussion to be had upon it, the vote is simply to be taken, and I ask the Senate now not to put it aside, but to proceed to vote upon it.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to make one remark. I have no doubt there will be time enough to dispose of this bill, and the bill to which the Senator from California refers, also. In relation to the remark of the Senator from New York I have this to say: I do not believe that his sense of propriety would permit him to attempt to fritter away the session unnecessarily. He, of course, will claim enough time to present his views clearly and fully. He has a right to that; and I have no doubt those who are in favor of the passage of the bill will listen patiently to all he has to say that may be said legitimately. I do not understand him to intend to convey the idea that he will speak against time with a view of defeating the bill. If there is a majority of the Senate that believe, under all the circumstances, the bill ought to pass, of course they will vote to take it up; and if there is not such a majority they will vote against it. I hope the vote may be had on the merits of the bill according to the opinion of Senators. I have no personal interest in it myself. I think, however, the Government is under obligation to enable this company to make its connection according to the original design and according to the law under which it began to build. I hope the Senators will vote according to their understanding of the merits of the case.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from New York intimates that if this bill be taken up now the day will be frittered away in discussion. That is very possible; but I do not foresee it unless he sees fit to consume the whole day by discussing the bill himself. I beg to say to the Senator that as this bill has received quite thorough discussion heretofore, and as he has spent more time in that discussion, according to my recollection, than any other member of the body, the question will be addressed to his sense of public duty whether he will fritter away the time of the Senate on this last day of the session in speaking against time with a view to defeat this measure. That is all I have to say about that. I cannot be intimidated by any such remarks as fell from the lips of the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not made up my mind to vote against this bill; I am deliberating on that subject; but I shall vote against taking it up at this time, and I hope it will not be taken up. I think the other bill has precedence, and we ought to give it that position to which it is entitled.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was informed this morning by a member of the other House—whether his judgment was correct or not I do not know—that there was a very strong probability that at the close of this day there would not be a quorum of the House left for business. It is perfectly obvious that the bill which we have passed this morning, if it goes to the other House, as it will now, will not be acted upon there; and there is no probability that if we have a discussion on this bill, and it goes to the House, it will be acted upon; and it is contrary to all precedent to take up on the last day of the session original Senate bills involving debate and considerations of great importance and send them to the House of Representatives. I think, therefore, this bill ought not to be taken up; but there is just as much propriety, in my judgment, in taking it up as there was in taking up the other bill and expending two hours upon it, and just as much to be accomplished by it. As the Senate seems disposed to use up the few remaining moments we have, which ought to be devoted to matters that can be disposed of, to bills to which there is no objection, and which are somewhat of a business character, such as that which is held at this moment by my friend from New Hampshire in his hands, and the executive business, I feel rather disposed to fall in with the sentiment of the Senate as exhibited this morning and vote to take up this bill. As we have spent a large portion of the day uselessly, in my judgment, I do not see why we should not go on in the same system, if that is agreeable to the Senate. I suppose there must be an understanding on the part of gentlemen that the result of that course will be to have an extra session of the Senate next week to dispose of executive business. That must be the inevitable consequence, and another consequence will be the defeat of a great many measures of more or less importance which could be passed if we would only act on them here and send them to the other House this morning. It is not a disagreeable thing for gentlemen like my friend from Iowa, who has a comfortable house here with his family nicely located, to stay another week or a fortnight. He probably will do so, whether Congress remains in session or not. But for those who have been here eight months, and who would like to return home as soon as the time comes on Monday, it is disagreeable to spend this time on railroad bills that cannot come to a termination this session instead of devoting it to ordinary matters and to settling those things which can be finally acted upon and disposed of at this session.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I rise to call the attention of the Senate to an important bill, hoping that they will afford me an opportunity to call it up, not to antagonize it with either of these bills now. The Senate will remember that at the last session we passed the bankrupt law, which provided that after six months none should have the benefit of it unless they paid fifty per cent. of their debts and a majority of their creditors agreed to the discharge. The House of Representatives have passed a bill extending the period within which one may take the benefit of the bankrupt law without paying fifty per cent. until January next. The whole southern delegation are urging the passage of the bill as essential to the interests of that section of the country, because the people were unable for the want of the requisite funds to deposit to take the benefit of the law within the first six months. Most of those at the North who desired to take the benefit of it have already done so, so that it is really a measure for the relief of the South, and a most important measure. I state this to the Senate now, so that when a motion is made to adjourn or to go into executive session they will remember that the bill to which I have called attention will be presented, and I hope they will deal favorably with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Michigan, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe there is a misapprehension as to a point of order, and perhaps I am responsible for it. I understand that last evening the Senate adjourned during the consideration of a bill which was in charge of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] If so, I suppose that is the unfinished business which comes up as a matter of course. But it seems impossible to untie this knot, and I wish the Senate would cut it. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. That is pending a call of the yeas and nays. Do not do that.

Mr. POMEROY. After the order to call the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, the Senator from Rhode Island cannot make another motion until that has been decided.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe it is the disposition of the Senate to remain here next week, and I therefore withdraw my motion. I submit to the wishes of a majority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, to take up Senate bill No. 256.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was inclined to favor the bill, but I think it useless to take it up now. I shall vote in the negative.

Mr. DRAKE. On all questions connected with this bill I am paired off with the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were present he would vote against the bill and I for it.

Mr. SUMNER. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] I should vote for taking up the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Ferry, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, McDonald, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, Wilson, and Yates—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Kellogg, McCreery, Morgan, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Whyte, and Williams—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cragin, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Pool, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Sumner, Vickers, and Willey—21.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 472) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security," with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1453) for the relief of William Grant Powers, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

APPEALS AND WRITS OF ERROR.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 472) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security."

Mr. CONKLING. The amendment need not be read. It is simply to add a provision as to corporations that passed the Senate in another bill. The House has put the two together. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1453) for the relief of William Grant Powers was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 358) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish cannon to Soldiers' Monument Association of Pequonock and Paterson, New Jersey, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 768, to protect the rights of American citizens abroad.

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand that this is a motion to postpone the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a motion to take up the unfinished business.

Mr. HOWE. The unfinished business, I suppose, is up. I understand the unfinished business to be the bill for the relief of O. N. Cutler. That is the bill which was pending last evening when the Senate went into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct; that is the unfinished business.

Mr. CONKLING. But that was taken up at last evening's session, which was specially for private business.

Mr. CONNESS. My motion is to supersede that, and take up for consideration House bill No. 768.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to make a suggestion. I have no objection to the unfinished business being laid aside informally, if the Senator's bill can be voted upon right away.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be laid aside informally, if there be no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I see that the Senator from Massachusetts is trying to get the floor. There is evidently a disposition to put this bill aside by a motion to go into executive session. My friend from Massachusetts, I am sorry to say, is proposing to make it. I hope the Senate will be candid enough, and just enough, to give us a vote now on this measure.

Mr. CONKLING. There is to be no more debate, I suppose?

Mr. CONNESS. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection to the proposition of the Senator from California, the bill (H. R. No. 768) to protect the rights of American citizens in foreign States is before the Senate. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, upon which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg pardon of the Chair; there have been several questions of detail since the bill came out of committee, and I wish to have the precise amendment reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Chief Clerk that the question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as it has been amended in the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish that that should be reported to the Senate in its precise condition, so that we shall know what we are voting on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended in the Senate, is to strike out the third section of the bill after the enacting clause, and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert:

That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that Government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release, and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall, as soon as practicable, be communicated by the President to Congress.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Kellogg, McCreery, McDonald, Morgan, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Welch, Whyte, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Sawyer, Sumner, Trumbull, and Willey—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Vickers, and Wade—22.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FERRY. I move to strike out the first section of the bill. I do not want to discuss it.

The words proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officer of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will not be done.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope it will be done. I do not see any necessity of enacting an abstract principle of that kind. The section is a prohibition against any officer of the Government of the United States expressing his opinions on a certain subject. I do not believe in such legislation.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope Senators will not strike out this section.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire of the Senator from Connecticut whether in moving to strike out the first section of the bill he intends to include the enacting clause?

Mr. FERRY. Of course not. My motion is to strike out all of the first section of the bill after the enacting clause. That leaves the practical part of the bill in the second and third sections sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will be left as it is.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howard, McCreery, Pomeroy, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Welch—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Whyte, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Kellogg, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Paterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stewart, Trumbull, Vickers, and Yates—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. The state of the question is this, as I understand it: the Senate has, by its vote, inserted the amendment of the Senator from Oregon as a substitute for the original third section. I now move that the third section be stricken out.

Mr. POMEROY. It was inserted not as a substitute for the original third section, but as a substitute for the amendment made in committee.

Mr. SUMNER. Now I move to strike out the third section.

Mr. CONNESS. That has just been inserted.

Mr. SUMNER. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon has been inserted as a substitute for the third section. That leaves the question behind as to whether there shall be a third section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, who moves to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Precisely; as a substitute for the amended third section. Now, the question is which form of third section do the Senate prefer, or do they prefer any third section. I submit that the bill is in better shape if there is no third section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire if the Senate has not agreed to the insertion of this section as amended?

Mr. CONNESS. Twice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I raise the question of order that the motion to strike out is not in order, for that is simply another form of moving to reconsider.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can take the vote quicker than have the point of order decided.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, to strike out the third section of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to strike out of the preamble the words "for the protection of which the Government of the United States was established."

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SUMNER. I suppose not.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. HOWARD. On the passage of the bill I have one word to say. I am in favor of authorizing the Executive to intervene in all cases where American citizens have been arrested and unjustly detained by foreign Governments. That is one of the duties which are devolved upon him by the position which he holds. It is a power which ought to be carefully and vigilantly exercised, peacefully, quietly exercised; but I am not in favor of devolving upon the President the enormous power which is granted to him by the third section of this bill. That section authorizes him and commands him to do any act not amounting to war which he may deem necessary in order to secure the liberation of an American citizen. He may resort to a species of reprisals upon the foreign Government. He may resort to non-intercourse. There are various acts preliminary to a declaration of war, and which almost always in the history of nations lead to war, that he may do under this broad authority which we are now conferring upon him.

Sir, the Constitution of the United States places in the hands and in the discretion of Congress the whole of the war-making power, and it devolves upon the President of the United States no portion of that power, whether it be the preliminary steps ordinarily preceding a war or the actual conduct of a war. Ours is a republican Government. The war-making authority is lodged in Congress; all the functions which can be performed by the Government of the United States growing out of legislation pertain to Congress; and although I conceive that Congress by such an act as this may lawfully and constitutionally commit this enormous discretion to the President, still it strikes me that it is a departure from those simple republican principles which lie at the foundation of our republican system, and underlie the Constitution itself. We are verging, I think, quite too rapidly toward a recognition of the one-man power in this great Republic, and it is time that we surveyed the position which we have taken. It is high time that we looked about us to see whether we are not diverging from that line of republican duty and republican principle which pertains to our Government.

I will never commit this dangerous discretion contemplated by this bill to any Executive; and although it is at the very heel of the session, when other business is extremely pressing upon us, I will not remain silent in my seat when such an authority as this is to be granted to the President of the United States. We know that Presidents are but frail mortals; the angels from heaven have not yet descended to occupy the presidential seat; and the destinies of the country are by this act placed in the hands of the Executive. He may be a wise man, he may be an unwise man, he may be a sound, philosophical, patriotic statesman, or he may be animated by selfish ambition and a desire to engage the country in war with foreign Governments. I would not give him that power, because under it he may in six weeks from the time it is bestowed upon him involve this country in a war with some of the foreign Powers of the earth. I cannot agree to it. I choose to keep this authority in the hands of Congress, and never permit it to be exercised even in this preliminary form without the consent of the law-making power of the Government, and I appeal to Senators to consider well whether they are not taking a step in this matter and setting a precedent which may in the end prove to be very dangerous and very destructive to the character of our national institutions.

I know that other business is so pressing that it is unkind in me further to occupy the time of the Senate on this subject, and I will therefore bring what I have to say to a close, with this remark: that we, as I think, owe no duty to Fenianism which can possibly justify the Congress of the United States in placing this enormous discretionary war-making power in the hands of Andrew Johnson, or any other President. I am willing to go as far as anybody in protecting American citizens abroad from injustice; but I am not willing to pervert the character of our own Government, in obsequiousness to this demand of the Fenian organizations, whose sole ambition is, and always has been, to involve the United States in a war with Great Britain on account of their cause. Sir, I am not afraid of war at home or abroad. I shrink from none of its responsibilities. When the cause is just and clear and honorable I would prosecute it at any expense to a successful termination. But I am unwilling that the Government of the United States should be drawn into an affiliation with a combination of men in whose real purposes our Government has really no interest, and can have very little sympathy. In saying this, I do not undertake to say that the Irish at home have not been oppressed by the British Government. That is a matter for the British Government and people, and it is not a matter in which the Government of the United States has a right to convert itself into an immense society of propagandism for the purpose of subserving the ambition and the claims of those persons.

Mr. FERRY. I am compelled by the course which the bill has taken to vote against it. The first section of the bill is in itself a merely legislative declaration of an abstraction, and that abstraction an untruth; for it is not true that the judicial decisions of the tribunals of this country, from the foundation of the Government, declaring the law of perpetual allegiance to be a part of the law of this nation as well as of the nations of Europe, are inconsistent with the fundamental principles of republican government. It is not true that the denial of the right of expatriation, as it is termed, is inconsistent with the fundamental principles upon which this Government is founded. Nay, more, sir, it may be necessary again and again for the Government of the United States to prevent the exercise of the right or capacity of expatriation. Every act which you pass in time of war to prevent your citizens abandoning their country and freeing themselves from the obligation to defend it by seeking a foreign soil is an act directly opposite to the first section of the present bill. So that that section being first a mere declaration of an abstraction, and that being in itself untrue, if ever capable of any real purpose, capable only of an evil purpose at a period when the country is in danger, it ought not, in my judgment, to receive the sanction of the Senate.

Again, so far as this bill undertakes to change the law with respect to the right of expatriation, it is an effort to change the law of nations by a municipal statute. It is my opinion that in the progress of society the time has come when the civilized nations should agree with each other to give to their citizens the right to change their homes and transfer their allegiance at such periods as the necessities of the home defense do not make it necessary for their respective Governments to call every citizen or subject to that defense. It is time that the law of nations should be changed so far as the doctrine of perpetual allegiance is concerned, because there is only one way in which that change can be accomplished, and that is by the mode which is now being adopted among the civilized nations of the earth, by the exercise of the treaty-making power. I will permit, I will vote for treaties between this nation and all the civilized nations of the earth for the purpose of accomplishing this object. In this way, and in this way only, can the object be accomplished; and no declaration of the Government of the United States that it is an inherent and inalienable right of the individual man to expatriate himself can possibly affect the municipal laws of any of the countries of Europe or of the civilized nations of the earth. Attempting, therefore, to do by municipal statute that which is impossible to perform is simply launching what is an absurdity, and, in my judgment, in the enactment of this bill we are exposing ourselves simply to the contempt of the nations of the earth so far as we are attempting to change the law of nations, which is common to all civilized nations, by a mere municipal statute of our own. The amendment which I offered yesterday declaring it to be the duty of this Government to protect equally the naturalized and native-born citizen, and declaring it to be the duty of the executive department of this Government when the rights of any citizen, either native-born or naturalized, were infringed by a foreign Government to resist such infringement, and to afford full and adequate protection, is all which this Government can do, and all that is necessary in order to accomplish every honest purpose of this bill.

Because, therefore, the bill, in my judgment, in its first section is a declaration of that which is a political untruth; because in its subsequent sections it is an effort to change the law of nations by a municipal statute, and therefore impossible of accomplishing the result which it seeks to accomplish; because the very ends to which the bill is directed are now being rapidly accomplished by the treaty-making power, the only power which can secure a full accomplishment of those ends, I am compelled to vote against the enactment of this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. There is not a single word the Senator has said that has not been fully replied to in this discussion already. Therefore I have nothing to say.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall vote for this bill, although there are some of its provisions which do not fully accord with my judgment; and therefore, although I could have preferred different language in the third section, my objections to that section are not strong enough to compel me to withhold my vote for the bill, which I regard rather as a legislative declaration than anything else. With the object of the bill to secure the rights of our citizens, both native and naturalized, everywhere I most fully agree. In foreign countries those rights are to be secured either by diplomacy or by arms. With Germany we have already entered into a treaty by which those rights are secured; the native born and the naturalized citizen are placed upon a footing of equality. As I am credibly informed and believe the British Government are about, in the negotiations which are pending between that Government and our own, to accede to the American doctrine of the right of expatriation. I believe that it will all be accomplished, and accomplished by diplomacy.

While I agree to a certain extent with the Senator from Michigan, that we are by this act intrusting partially the war-making power to the Executive, I do not think that we transcend the Constitution as far as we go in this bill. If my own judgment had been consulted I should have preferred the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania; still the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon is not so essentially different that I shall withhold my assent from the bill itself.

I felt called upon to say this much, because in the progress of legislating on this bill I have had occasion to vote against several amendments which have been offered from time to time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Give us the yeas and nays. ["No!" "No!"] I withdraw the demand.

Mr. DRAKE. I want the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 39, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Kellogg, McCreery, McDonald, Morgan, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Welch, Whyte, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Howard, and Van Winkle—5.

So the bill was passed.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. SAWYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 176) extending the benefits of an act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, approved July 2, 1862, as amended by act of July 23, 1860, to States lately in rebellion; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put the joint resolution on its passage.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that resolution will be passed at once. It is simply extending the agricultural college law to these States as fast as they are reconstructed. The Committee on Public Lands have examined it.

Mr. HOWE. If it can pass without disturbing the unfinished business I shall not object.

Mr. POMEROY. I presume it will pass without any debate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. The preamble recites that under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," and under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 23, 1866, entitled "An act to amend the fifth section of an act entitled 'An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts,' and approved July 2, 1862, so as to extend the time within which the provisions of said act shall be accepted and such colleges established," the several States and Territories became entitled, under certain conditions, to grants of land or land scrip; and that by a resolution of the Senate and the House of Representatives, approved March 29, 1867, the issue or delivery of the land scrip to any of the States lately in rebellion against the United States, except the State of Tennessee, was prohibited until those States should be fully restored to their rights as States by Congress; and that several of the States lately in rebellion have already been fully restored to their rights as States by Congress. The joint resolution, therefore, directs the issue of the land scrip to the States thus fully restored to their rights as States by Congress under the conditions and limitations prescribed in those acts; and the authority and direction herein contained is made to apply to States lately in rebellion, not yet fully restored to their rights as States by Congress, so soon as they shall be thus restored.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that resolution is to be passed I desire to move an amendment to the last clause. Some of that land scrip I am told has been issued, and the authority ought to be legalized for that which has already been issued. It was issued when the Senator from Iowa was Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, there was scrip issued to North Carolina, I think, but the delivery was suspended.

Mr. POMEROY. This would not allow any extra scrip.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish simply to authorize and legalize that which has already been issued.

Mr. HARLAN. I would make this suggestion to the Senator: I am not sure but that scrip was issued in the name of the then Governor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I only know that complaints have been made that obstructions have been thrown in the way of its use.

Mr. POMEROY. I have been told that none was issued except to North Carolina, and after the passage of that amended act it was recalled. I am so informed by Mr. SAWYER, who has investigated the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told that innocent parties hold this land scrip, and in ignorance of the law have been taken in. It ought to be legalized. There is no objection to it, as a matter of course.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the amendment the Senator proposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move, then, to amend the joint resolution by adding the following:

And all such warrants already issued to either of said States are hereby legalized and declared to be a part of the share of such State.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution I offered the other day in regard to the compensation of the new Senators from the reconstructed States, and let it be disposed of in some way. I offer it in the interest of the Secretary of the Senate, that he may know how to settle their accounts. The resolution that I offered is in the form of the resolution adopted in reference to the Senators from Tennessee some two or three years ago; but if the Senate prefer to adopt a different resolution I have nothing to say about it. I merely wish to get action upon it. I think it due to the Secretary that it should be acted on. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to let that resolution be acted upon.

Mr. HOWE. That resolution will lead to debate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not debate it.

Mr. HOWE. Debate was indicated very clearly the other day; and I prefer that the unfinished business should be disposed of unless the Senate will agree to lay that aside to dispose of a report of a committee of conference which is lying on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution mentioned by the Senator from Illinois being objected to goes over.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Allow me to call up a pension bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to allow me to call up a House bill reported from the Judiciary Committee with an amendment, which will lead to no debate I think, for the protection of officers in the war against certain suits, allowing the transfer of those suits.

Mr. HOWE. I would do so with all the pleasure in the world if the Senate would only allow me to dispose of that conference report which I attempted to get up yesterday.

Mr. CONKLING. That is a privileged matter, and this will lead to no debate.

Mr. HOWE. I have never been able to see the privilege.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I hope the Senator will remember the touching appeal I made to him some time ago. [Laughter.]

REWARD FOR JEFFERSON DAVIS'S CAPTURE.

Mr. HOWE. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside to dispose of that report of the conference committee.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their first, second, third, and fourth amendments.

TIMOTHY O. HOWE,

HENRY WILSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. B. WASHBURN,

L. W. ROSS,

Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to know what those amendments are.

Mr. HOWARD. I have a word to say on agreeing to that report.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to know what those amendments are.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state them.

Mr. President, a bill recently passed the House of Representatives distributing the reward offered by the President of the United States under his proclamation of May 2, 1863, offering the sum of $100,000 for the arrest of Jefferson Davis. It is well known that the actual arrest of Davis was by Colonel Pritchard, lieutenant colonel of the fourth Michigan cavalry, then on service in Georgia. Colonel Pritchard, with a small command of one hundred and twenty-eight men and seven officers, surrounded the camp of Davis before daylight on the morning of the 10th of May, 1865, and had him in his possession. He made the arrest, capturing Davis and his suite, all of whom he conducted back to Macon, which was the place whence he started on his march, and from Macon to Fortress Monroe. The reward offered under the proclamation of the 2d of May was never known either to Pritchard or any of his command, or to Major General

Wilson, who was the cavalry commander in that department, nor to Colonel Harnden, who commanded the Wisconsin regiment, until some days after the arrest of Davis. The actual arrest, as I have remarked, was made by Colonel Pritchard and his one hundred and twenty-eight men of the fourth Michigan cavalry.

The Secretary of War, during the year 1865, instituted a military commission, consisting of the Adjutant General of the Army and of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, to whom he referred the duty of deciding what would be a proper distribution of the reward thus offered by the President. That commission reported during the next year, early, I think, in 1866, perhaps in the fall of 1865, that the whole of this reward was justly due to Colonel Pritchard of the fourth Michigan cavalry, and to his regiment, who were acting with him for the purpose of arresting Davis. The sum of $10,000 was awarded to Colonel Pritchard under the finding of the commission.

In 1866 a bill was introduced into the House of Representatives for carrying out the award thus made by the military commission. It passed the House of Representatives, granting to Colonel Pritchard $10,000, and to his men the balance of the sum offered, distributed to them according to the law of prize. That bill having passed the House came into the Senate, and being connected with some other provisions, and being called up here for discussion, as it was likely to lead to a protracted discussion I gave my consent that that portion of the bill which distributed the award to Pritchard and his men might be stricken out, with a view to pass the remainder of the bill, the claimants under the remainder of the bill being very pressing for their money and standing in need of it. Those claimants were those who captured Booth and his confederates.

Afterward, and during the present session of Congress, the bill now under consideration was introduced into the House of Representatives, giving to Colonel Pritchard only $3,000, and to his men a proportional amount; giving to Major General Wilson, who commanded the troops in Georgia, the sum of $3,000, and to Colonel Harnden, of the first Wisconsin cavalry, $3,000, and to his men a proportional amount. The bill was referred by the Senate to the Committee on Claims, who took it under consideration and reported it back to the Senate with an amendment. By that amendment the award to General Wilson of $3,000 was stricken out and $1,000 of it given to Colonel Pritchard, $1,000 of it to Colonel Harnden, and $1,000 to Captain Yeoman, who was from Ohio.

The question now before the Senate is this: whether, under the circumstances of the case, it is just and fair to the men who made the actual capture of Jeff. Davis that General Wilson should receive this sum of $3,000. I think upon principle, in the first place, if it were an original question upon which it was proper for the Senate to pass, that no person was justly entitled to the reward offered by the President of the United States for the arrest of Davis; first, for the reason that that reward did not instigate any exertion on the part of the real captors of Davis to proceed to capture him; and secondly, that all these men were in the employment of the Government, and it was their duty as military men, whether officers or soldiers, to seek for Davis and for the other chiefs of the confederacy, and to make them prisoners wherever they could be found. But it seems to have been the inclination both of the War Department and of Congress to distribute this sum of $100,000 to somebody, and the House have agreed by their bill to give General Wilson $3,000 of this award. Now, sir, I object to it.

At the time of the capture of Davis, General Wilson had his headquarters at Macon, Georgia. He knew the exact state of things as early as the 27th of April, for on that day he received a telegram in cipher from General Sherman informing him that Johnston had surrendered his forces and that the rebellion was really at an end in this part of the country. He knew, therefore, that the chiefs of the rebellion would be endeavoring to make their escape out of the country, and it was his duty as a good officer, and nobody doubts that he is a good and gallant officer, to use every means in his power to anticipate the flight of the rebel chiefs, who were making their way, as was supposed, across the country toward the Mississippi river. It was a moment when ordinary prudence, mere ordinary care would have suggested to the mind of every military officer that every avenue of escape should be watched and guarded, in order that the chiefs of the rebellion might be arrested and made prisoners before escaping from the country. I say that on the part of General Wilson there was no extraordinary effort at all. He simply did his duty; and the question now before the Senate is whether we will reward a military officer holding the commission of major general, and receiving the liberal pay which we gave to our major generals, with a portion of this douceur, which was intended by the President of the United States to be given to the person who ever he might be or the persons whoever they might be who actually made the arrest.

Now, sir, General Wilson, in the statement which he makes, dated at Davenport, Iowa, January 17, 1867, states his position very plainly and clearly. He says:

"The situation of my command was peculiar. Originally organized as a corps under General Sherman, the commanding general of the military division of the Mississippi, and not having been transferred, it still formed a legitimate part of his command wherever he might be. General Sherman with the main body of his army was at that time in North Carolina, moving northward. Before leaving North Carolina he had instructed me to report with my entire corps, except Kilpatrick's division, to Major General George H. Thomas, to assist in the operations against Hood. It was the intention of General Sherman, however, as developed in frequent conversations with me while lying at Galesville, Alabama, in October, 1864, that as soon as Hood could be disposed of and my command could be reorganized and remounted I should gather together every man and horse that could be made fit for service and march through the richer parts of Alabama and Georgia, for the purpose of destroying the railroad communications and supplies of the rebels, and bringing my command into the theater of operations toward which all our great armies were moving.

"In the campaign terminating at Macon I had actually moved under the direct instructions of General Thomas, but with the indirect latitude of an independent commander," transmitted through him from General Grant in person. I found myself cut off from all communication with these generals, but liable to receive orders from either or all of them, and from the Secretary of War in addition. My first duty was clearly to take care of the public interests and to reconcile orders afterward, should they come in conflicting terms from different directions.

"In anticipation of a final break up of the rebel forces, I had already determined to keep a sharp lookout for Davis and the leading rebel authorities. As soon as I became satisfied, by reliable instructions from General Sherman, that he had actually concluded an armistice, and intended it to apply to my command, I felt bound to observe it, but only upon the condition that the rebels should also comply with its provisions in equal good faith. One of those provisions was that neither party should make any changes in the station of troops during the continuance of the armistice. My command while remaining in camp was therefore kept on the alert, and ready to move in any direction. Having heard from citizens, however, that Davis was making his way toward the South with an escort, I directed my command to take possession of the railroads, and to send scouts in all directions in order that I might receive timely notice of the rebel movements. The armistice was declared null and void by the President, but at least one day before I had been advised of this through General Thomas and General Gillmore, I received from General Sherman a cypher dispatch informing me of the formal termination of hostilities by the surrender of General Johnston and all the forces under his command east of the Chattahoochee. This was on the 27th day of April."

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will let us vote on this. This is the last day of the session.

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a few more words to say. I cannot permit this subject to pass by without stating the just claims of the fourth Michigan cavalry, and without bringing, so far as is reasonable, into clear contrast the position taken by General Wilson. He was simply acting in the line of his duty under instructions from General Sherman and General Grant. It was his duty to guard every passage, every avenue of escape, and he did so with most commendable vigilance and activity, I agree; but the question for the Senate is whether General Wilson, holding that high position and charged with those high responsibilities, as a soldier, has not been sufficiently rewarded by the reputation which he has gained, the glory which he has achieved, and which will forever brighten his brow, whether he has not gained enough in this way to satisfy his claims upon the Government. I insist that by making himself a claimant and coming in for a small pittance of this reward which was offered to the real captors of Jeff. Davis he is not pursuing precisely the course which a high sense of delicacy would dictate to a high officer of the Army. I prefer, therefore, that the bill should pass as it was reported from the Committee on Claims of the Senate, and that the $3,000 which the House has given to General Wilson should be given, $1,000 to Colonel Pritchard, $1,000 to Colonel Harnden, of the first Wisconsin, and $1,000 to Captain Yeoman, of the Ohio volunteers, in reward for their especial activity, vigilance, fatigues, and labors in about the arrest of Davis; and I submit to the Senate that this is doing nothing more than simple justice to those gallant officers.

Mr. President, if I have consumed the time of the Senate on this question, I hope they will pardon me. It will occur to every Senator that the officers and men of the fourth Michigan cavalry have some sensibility about this, and I think their feelings ought not to be trifled with, and I think this $3,000 ought to be distributed to their commander, the commander of the first Wisconsin cavalry, and also to Captain Yeoman, of Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to take up House bill No. 1446 from the table. I wish to offer an amendment to it, and then put it upon its passage. It will take but a moment. It is the bill to remove political disabilities from Michael Hahn and other citizens.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BUCKALEW, to insert after "Louisiana," in the sixth line, "and John Young Brown, of Kentucky."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "Louisiana," in the sixth line, the following:

James Riskey, of Morehouse parish, Louisiana; William C. Carr, of Union parish, Louisiana; John L. Barrett, of Union parish, Louisiana; Richard H. Cuney, of East Baton Rouge, Louisiana; Robert Ray, of New Orleans, Louisiana; Andrew T. Stone, of Rocky Comfort, Arkansas; Riley B. Archer, of Arkansas; James A. Hicks, of Arkansas; Rufus L. Archer, of Arkansas; Z. C. Ross, of Arkansas; George W. Christy, of New Orleans, Louisiana, and W. F. Richardson, Union county, Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion."

Subsequently,

Mr. STEWART said: I desire to move a reconsideration of House bill No. 1446, the bill removing political disabilities. I was not aware that an amendment had been made inserting the name of John Young Brown. That will undoubtedly create trouble in the House and may defeat the bill. I therefore move a reconsideration with a view of leaving out that name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be done by unanimous consent without a reconsideration.

Mr. STEWART. Then I ask that by common consent that name be left out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to that course? No objection being made it will be so ordered.

STATIONERY FOR INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 175. It is very important that it should pass, and it will lead to no discussion.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 175) relative to the recent contract for stationery for the Department of the Interior was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to annul and cancel the contract made by him with Messrs. Dempsey & O'Toole for supplying the Department of the Interior and the several bureaus and offices thereof with stationery for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, (under the advertisement issued May 25, 1868,) and to enter into a contract for the articles mentioned in the advertisement with Blanchard & Mohun, the latter being the lowest and best bidder therefor.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to take up House bill No. 1021, the bill to which I referred this morning. It will take but a minute.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1021) in amendment of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867. It provides that the provisions of the second clause of the thirty-third section of the bankrupt act shall not apply to the cases of proceedings in bankruptcy commenced prior to the 1st of January, 1869, and it extends the time during which the operation of the provisions of the clause is postponed until the 1st of January, 1869. And it proposes to amend the clause so as to read as follows:

In all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after the 1st day of January, 1869, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to fifty per cent of the claims proved against his estate upon which he shall be liable as the principal debtor, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors to whom he shall have become liable as principal debtor, and who shall have proved their claims, be filed in the case at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge.

The bill proposes further to amend the act as follows: the phrase "presented or defended" in the fourteenth section of the act is to read "prosecuted or defended;" the phrase "non-resident debtors," in line five, section twenty-two, of the act as printed in the Statutes-at-Large, is to read "non-resident creditors;" the word "or," in the next to the last line of the thirty-ninth section of the act, is to read "and;" the phrase "section thirteen," in the forty-second section of the act, is to read "section eleven;" the phrase "or spends any part thereof in gaming," in the forty-fourth section of the act, is to read "or shall spend any part thereof in gaming;" and the words "with the senior register, or" and the phrase "to be delivered to the register," in the forty-seventh section of the act, are to be stricken out. Registers in bankruptcy are to have power to administer oaths in all cases and in relation to all matters in which oaths may be administered by commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States, and such commissioners may take proof of debts in bankruptcy in all cases, subject to the revision of such proof by the register and by the court according to the provisions of the act.

Mr. SPRAGUE. When this bill was first agitated there were remonstrances sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the understanding was that that committee was to delay reporting favorably upon this bill. It is manifestly unjust and unfair toward the people who are adverse to this measure that it should be reported here at this late period of the session. I think it ought not to pass until it has consideration and the remonstrants have had some opportunity to express themselves and be heard. They were informed by the committee, or through those representing the committee, that this bill would not be agitated at this session.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move to amend the first section—

Mr. FESSENDEN and others. Oh, no; let it go.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move to amend by adding this proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall only apply to the States lately in rebellion.

I am opposed to extending the time in the States where the law has been in full operation.

Several SENATORS. Let it pass without amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN. I withdraw the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE EXPENSES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, have instructed me to report it back with two amendments. It is a very short bill, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it at the present moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $20,200 for the employment of temporary clerks in the Indian Bureau, to be employed at the following rates: one clerk at $1,600, six clerks at $1,400 each, seven clerks at $1,200 each, and two female copyists at $900 each. It also appropriates $9,000 for the employment of temporary clerks in the State Department, who are to receive a compensation of $1,200 each per annum. It further appropriates $9,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the salary, office expenses, and clerk hire of the surveyor general of Utah Territory, in accordance with the provisions of the act of July 16, 1868.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Henry B. Ste. Marie, the sum of $10,000 for services and information in the arrest of John H. Surratt in the kingdom of Italy, charged with the crimes of conspiracy and murder; and the joint resolution for the relief of Henry B. Ste. Marie, approved July 20, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That has passed both Houses in another form.

Mr. SUMNER. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, for the purpose of building an arched roadway over Tiber Creek on North Capitol street leading to the Government Printing Office: Provided, The city of Washington will appropriate a sufficient additional amount to complete it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DEFENSE OF OFFICERS AGAINST SUITS.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to take up House bill No. 1131, with a view of concurring in an amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary and sending it back to the House.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1131) regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases for the protection of officers and agents of the Government, and for the better defense of the Treasury against unlawful claims. It provides that all the provisions of section eight of the act of July 28, 1866, entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes," and the forms and modes by that section and the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1863, therein referred to, prescribed for prosecuting suits, withholding executions, and paying judgments against officers of the United States, or other persons engaged in executing the acts relative to captured and abandoned property, shall extend and be applied to all suits and proceedings (except those in behalf of the United States) which have been brought, or may hereafter be brought, against any officer or agent of the Government, civil or military, for acts done during the rebellion while acting by virtue or under color of his office or employment; and every defendant in such suit or proceeding having made full defense thereto, and having notified the Attorney General of the United States to appear and defend the same, is to be entitled to the full benefit and protection provided in that section for officers and agents of the Government engaged in the collection of the public revenue; and any defendant being aggrieved by any order or direction, certificate, ruling, or judgment of any court made or had in any such proceeding, may except thereto and appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of the United States, and have the questions arising there heard and determined.

No action or suit is to be maintained in any court of the United States, or of any State thereof, in the name or in the behalf or interest of any alien against the United States, or any person for or on account of any act done or omitted to be done by such person as an officer or agent of the United States in the administration of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," approved March 12, 1863, or of the act of Congress entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 2, 1864, or in virtue or under color of those acts of Congress, or any other acts of Congress relative to the insurrectionary States, or to person or property therein, and to any action or suit which may have been heretofore, or shall hereafter be instituted by any alien against the United States, or any such person, on account of any act done or omitted to be done the defendant may and shall plead or allege in bar thereof that such act was done or omitted to be done in the administration of one of those acts of Congress, or in virtue or under color thereof, and such plea or allegation, if the fact be sustained by the proof, is to be, and shall be deemed and adjudged in law to be, a complete and conclusive bar to any such suit or action; but this section is not to be construed so as to deprive aliens who are citizens or subjects of any Government which accords to citizens of the United States the right to prosecute claims against such Government in its courts, of the privilege of prosecuting claims against the United States in the Court of Claims as now provided by law. It is declared to have been the true intent and meaning of the act approved March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," that the remedy given in cases of seizure made under the act, by preferring claim in the Court of Claims, should be exclusive, precluding the owner of any property taken by agents of the Treasury Department as abandoned or captured property in virtue or under color of the act from suit at common law, or any other mode of redress whatever, before any court or tribunal other than the Court of Claims; and in all cases in which suits of trespass, replevin, detinue, or any other form of action may have been brought and are now pending, or shall hereafter be brought against any person for or on account of private property taken by such person as an officer or agent of the United States, in virtue or under color of that act, or the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," the defendant may and shall plead or allege in bar thereof that such act was done or omitted to be done by him as an officer or agent of the United States in the administration of one of those acts of Congress, or in virtue or under color thereof, and such plea or allegation, if the fact be sustained by the proof is to be, and shall be deemed and adjudged in law to be, a complete and conclusive bar to any such suit or action.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That no judgment recovered in accordance with this act shall be paid by the United States unless the amount received by the defendant as the proceeds of the transaction which was the foundation of the suit shall have been paid into the Treasury, except upon an appropriation duly made therefor after a full examination of the claim upon its merits.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise simply to express my opposition to the bill. It is not my purpose to make any speech against it, nor to make a solitary remark against its passage, but simply to express my utter opposition to the passage of any such measure.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not been able to satisfy my judgment that this bill ought to pass. I do not expect at this stage of the session to make any special opposition to the bill. I tried to see its merits in the Committee on the Judiciary, but was not able to do so. How far it would go, how much may it involve, I cannot undertake to say now, but I think it is not a safe bill to pass.

The bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 644.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts will be taken up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to move to take up the bill granting a pension to Mrs. Hackleman.

Mr. SUMNER. Let this bill be acted on first. It will not take a minute.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask to take up a bill which I have tried to take up ever since my colleague left, and which he was seeking to have considered when he did leave, for the relief of Mrs. Hackleman, the widow of General Hackleman, to grant her a pension, and I ask its consideration now. It has been utterly impossible for me to get the floor; the Senator has occupied the floor to the extent of my observation about half the time. I think it but reasonable that some of the rest of us should have an opportunity occasionally to get up a bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit a privileged motion, one which must be adopted if we intend to close without an extra session. It is impossible to pass all the bills that Senators have in charge. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. We have scarcely time left now to finish that business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let me pass this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are others equally pressing.

Mr. SUMNER. The little bill I have got here will take but a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Every Senator has a bill that he wants passed. I insist upon my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

LIGHTING OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. HENDRICKS. While the doors are being closed, I move to take up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Hackleman.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand that there is a proposition here from the House in relation to lighting the avenue. The House have amended a Senate joint resolution on that subject, and I hope it will be acted on at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate take up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Indiana? Is there any objection?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to taking up any bill of any kind whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be considered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not make the objection with reference to the particular bill of the Senator from Indiana, but to any business except that which was executive business according to the direction of the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. I will state to the Senator from Maine that Congress has refused to pay for lighting the avenues this year, and the House has amended an old Senate resolution so as to authorize a tax to be levied on the property to pay for the lighting. That ought to be acted on at once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot consent, because it would appear to be invidious toward my friend from Indiana. My objection was not to taking up his bill, but any bill.

Mr. HARLAN. I move, then, that the doors be considered open for the purpose of considering the amendment of the House to Senate joint resolution No. 57.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not.

Mr. HARLAN. I am sure Senators do not want to leave this city in darkness.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The House chose to leave it in darkness.

Mr. HARLAN. We may not choose to agree with them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have done so.

Mr. HARLAN. But they have sent us an amendment to a Senate resolution on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They struck out of an appropriation bill the appropriation for this purpose. They have decided it.

Mr. HARLAN. It seems to me to be a hardship if the United States will neither light the streets in this city nor allow the people to light them out of their own pockets.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all of the second section of the amendment after the enacting clause and inserting:

That the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington be, and they are hereby, authorized to contract with the Washington Gas-Light Company for the term of one year, and so from year to year until otherwise provided by law, at such rates as may be agreed upon not exceeding the maximum now fixed by law, for all the illuminating gas required for the avenue and street lamps and public offices of the city and public grounds under the control of said city.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the House, as amended, was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The doors were closed, and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1452) to repeal section one hundred and thirty-six of the act of June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to support the Government, and for other purposes."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1869;

A bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867;

A bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1275) relating to the Alexandria canal.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in obedience to law, the report of the board of naval officers appointed to select suitable locations for powder magazines; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KELLOGG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 646) to guaranty the payment of certain bonds to be issued under the authority of the government of the State of Louisiana for the purpose of building and repairing levees in said State; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 177) to extend the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to loyal citizens of the State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LEVEES ON THE LOWER MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taking measures by the General Government to rebuild the levees upon the lower Mississippi river which were destroyed during the late war; and that the said committee have leave to report at the next session of Congress by bill or otherwise.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1452) to repeal section one hundred and thirty-six of the act of June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to support the Government, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 25th instant signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 252) to create an additional land district in the State of Minnesota;

An act (S. No. 286) to incorporate the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America;

An act (S. No. 433) authorizing the trustees of Union Chapel of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the city of Washington to mortgage their property for church purposes;

An act (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska;

An act (S. No. 492) to extend the time for the completion of the Southern Pacific railroad in the State of California;

An act (S. No. 509) in addition to an act passed March 26, 1864, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States';"

An act (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) granting permission to officers and soldiers to wear the badge of the corps in which they served during the war; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 121) to carry into effect the resolution approved March 2, 1867, providing for the exchange of certain public documents.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CORBETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 181) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Robert L. Stockton, late Indian agent, reported adversely, and moved the indefinite postponement of the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD, from the select joint Committee on Ordnance, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War to the President of the Senate of the 21st of July, inclosing a letter of the 20th of July from Brevet Major General A. B. Dyer, Chief of Ordnance, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 396) for the relief of Samuel Tibbets, reported it without amendment.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—VETO.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary, announcing that he returned to the Senate, in which House it originated, the bill (S. No. 567) relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance, with his objections thereto in writing.

The veto message was read, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

Believing that a bill entitled "An act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance" interferes with the appointing power conferred by the Constitution upon the Executive, and for other reasons which at this late period of the session time will not permit me to state, I herewith return it to the Senate, in which House it originated, without my approval. ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 25, 1868.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I really do not recollect what that bill is, and I ask for the reading of it.

The bill was read as follows:

An act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the duties and powers of Commissioner of the Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees shall continue to be discharged by the present Commissioner of the bureau, and in case of vacancy in said office occurring by reason of his death or resignation the same shall be filled by appointment of the President on the nomination of the Secretary of War, and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and no officer of the Army shall be detailed for service as Commissioner unless appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and all assistant commissioners, agents, clerks, and assistants, shall be appointed by the Secretary of War on the nomination of the Commissioner of the bureau. In case of vacancy in the office of Commissioner happening during the recess of the Senate the duties of Commissioner shall be discharged by the acting assistant adjutant general of the bureau until such vacancy can be filled.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of the bureau shall, on the 1st day of January next, cause the said bureau to be withdrawn from the several States within which said bureau has acted and its operations shall be discontinued. But the educational department of the said bureau and the collection and payment of moneys due the soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs, shall be continued as now provided by law until otherwise ordered by act of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill, notwithstanding the objection of the President of the United States; and upon this question the yeas and nays will be taken.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 42, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Frolinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, and Whyte—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Trumbull, and Vickers—17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are forty-two, and the nays five. Two thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States.

A message was afterward received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing that the House having proceeded in conformity with the Constitution to reconsider the bill entitled "An act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau, and providing for its discontinuance," returned to the Senate by the President of the United States with his objections, and sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives, with the message of the President relating to the resolution, and the proceedings of the Senate thereon, had Resolved, That the said bill do pass, two thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to the same.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to present to the Secretary of State the enrolled bill entitled "An act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance," together with the certificates of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, showing that the said bill was passed by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress after the same had been returned to the Senate by the President with his objections, and after the reconsideration of said bill by both Houses of Congress in accordance with the Constitution.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States;

A bill (H. R. No. 1131) regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases for the protection of officers and agents of the Government and for the better defense of the Treasury against unlawful claims; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1375) to transfer to the Department of the Interior certain powers and duties now exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with Indian affairs.

The message also announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 442) to amend section one of an act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, and for other purposes, approved March 8, 1863;

A bill (S. No. 598) for the relief of Mary Scott;

A bill (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Nancy Smith;

A bill (S. No. 634) granting a pension to Violet Henry;

A bill (S. No. 630) granting a pension to Mrs. Sallie Griffin;

A bill (S. No. 606) granting a pension to Robert Watson; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 172) to construe an act entitled "An act to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core."

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN A. BINGHAM of Ohio, Mr. H. E. PAINE of Wisconsin, and Mr. J. B. BECK of Kentucky, managers on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. B. F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, Mr. W. B. STOKES of Tennessee, and Mr. L. W. ROSS of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 767) to regulate the disposition of lands that may be hereafter granted to aid in the construction of railways;

A bill (H. R. No. 1455) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1454) making regulations as to the public debt;

A bill (H. R. No. 1456) to authorize the importation of machinery for repair only free of duty;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 361) for the relief of Helen Lincoln and Heloise Lincoln, and for the withholding of money from tribes of Indians holding American captives; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to aid in relieving from peonage women and children of the Navajo Indians.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 209) to incorporate the Evening Star Newspaper Company;

A bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of Eliza Mascher, widow of John F. Mascher;

A bill (S. No. 472) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security;"

A bill (S. No. 540) to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 147) for the relief of Jonathan S. Turner;

A bill (H. R. No. 433) for the relief of Palemon John;

A bill (H. R. No. 722) for the relief of Sally C. Northrup;

A bill (H. R. No. 834) for the relief of Hon. George W. Bridges, a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress;

A bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports;

A bill (H. R. No. 1322) for the relief of Major F. F. Stevens, assistant paymaster United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1365) for the relief of Captain Thomas W. Miller;

A bill (H. R. No. 1366) for the relief of Captain A. G. Olivar; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 296) giving the assent of the United States to the construction of certain wharves in the harbor of Oswego, New York.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. WILSON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. STEWART, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. BUCKALEW.

EXECUTIVE EXPENSES.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. CRAGIN, and Mr. HARLAN.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to admit certain persons to the Naval Academy.

The message also announced that the House had appointed Mr. W. H. KELSEY, of New York, on the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, in the place of Mr. B. F. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, excused.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk, in reply to the resolution of the Senate asking the concurrence of the House in the suspension of the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules, be directed respectively to inform the Senate that by the construction given by the House to the concurrent resolution on adjournment, no certain time is yet fixed for the close of the second session of the fortieth Congress, and, on that account, no action has been taken on the resolution of the Senate for the suspension of the said sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, remaining in executive session till five o'clock p. m., when the Senate took a recess till half past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Commissioner of Education, on the educational interests of the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

LA CROSSE AND MILWAUKEE RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1052.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1052) amendatory of an act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to make it lawful for the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin to dispose of the lands granted and which may have been inured and been certified to the State of Wisconsin under the act of Congress approved June 3, 1856, to aid in the construction of a railroad "from Madison or Columbus, by way of Portage City, to the Saint Croix river or lake, between townships twenty-five and thirty-one," and commonly known as La Crosse and Milwaukee railroad, for the benefit of the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company, a company existing under and by virtue of the laws of Wisconsin; but this act is to apply only to such lands as may be due the State of Wisconsin for the portion of the road already completed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to suspend the execution of his order of the 14th instant restoring to market the lands heretofore withdrawn by him for the use of the Southern Pacific railroad in California, until he can reexamine the matter, and that he be requested to grant a rehearing therein.

GRANTEES OF ANN D. DURDING.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 910) for the relief of the grantees of Ann D. Durning, to report it back without amendment. This is a little bill that was prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and I have a letter recommending its passage. It is simply to correct an error in an entry. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The preamble recites that Ann D. Durning, by her duly appointed attorney, attempted to locate the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section twenty-one, in township ninety-seven north, of range six west, in the district of lands subject to sale at Dubuque, Iowa, on the 7th of November, 1851, with bounty land warrant No. 23525, for forty acres, issued under the act of September 28, 1850, but by an error the location was made in township ninety-one north instead of ninety-seven north, and a patent was issued on the location in township ninety-one north, which patent was destroyed by fire by the burning of the land office at Dubuque; that the tract in township ninety-seven north has been withdrawn from market under the act of Congress approved May 12, 1864, to aid in constructing the McGregor western railroad, but has not been taken by or approved to that road at this time; and that the tract in township ninety-seven north has been several times conveyed, and Ann D. Durning cannot now be found, and the loss of the tract of land to her grantees would result in a great hardship to them. The bill, therefore, authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause the records and papers in the case to be corrected, and to issue a patent for the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section twenty-one, in township ninety-seven north of range six west, Iowa, in the name of Ann D. Durning.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLUMNS OF OLD PENNSYLVANIA BANK.

Mr. CATTELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 328. It will take but a minute to pass it.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 328) for the donation of certain columns was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to donate to such cemeteries as have been in whole or in part dedicated to the burial of soldiers or sailors who lost their lives in defense of the United States, or to such voluntary associations of citizens as contributed to the comfort and wants of these patriots while living, the six columns taken from the old Pennsylvania bank building, in the city of Philadelphia; but only one column is to be donated to such cemetery or association in any one State, and the same shall be used as a monument.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COOLIE TRADE.

Mr. SUMNER. There is a bill on the table which I have been trying to call up for a day or two past. It is Senate bill No. 644. I move that it be now taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 644) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coolie trade by American citizens in American vessels," approved February 19, 1862, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend all the provisions of an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coolie trade by American citizens in American vessels," approved February 19, 1862, so as to include and embrace the inhabitants or subjects of Japan, or of any other oriental country, known as coolies, in the same manner and to the same extent as such act and its provisions apply to the inhabitants and subjects of China.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHT OF WAY OVER LEAVENWORTH RESERVE.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1447) granting the right of way to certain railroad companies over the military reserve of Fort Leavenworth, to report it back without amendment, and ask that it be put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, to the Leavenworth and Des Moines Railroad Company, a corporation created under the laws of the State of Missouri, to construct and operate a railway across the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, on the east side of the Missouri river, upon a line to be designated and fixed by the Secretary of War. It also proposes to grant the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, to the Leavenworth, Atchison, and Northeastern Railway Company, a corporation created under the laws of the State of Kansas, to construct and operate a railroad across and over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, upon such line as shall be designated and fixed by the Secretary of War; but if the company shall not construct within one year from the passage of the act a railway from the city of Leavenworth to the city of Atchison then, and in that case, a like privilege is conferred upon any other company that shall construct a railway between those cities.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 571.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 571) to provide for a more economical administration of the governments of the several Territories of the United States, and for other purposes. It provides that from and after its passage the Legislatures of the several Territories of the United States shall meet but once in every two years and the next meeting of each of the Legislatures shall begin two years from the date of their last sessions, respectively, and no moneys are to be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States to pay the legislative expenses of the several Territories for any other than the biennial sessions; and the salaries of the Governors of the several Territories of the United States are to be fixed at $2,500 per annum.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to inquire how the Territory would stand in case of a certain emergency, an Indian war, or something of that sort. There ought to be a discretion somewhere to call the Legislature together.

Mr. RAMSEY. This applies to the regular and ordinary sessions of the Legislature.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then I move to amend the bill by inserting "unless specially convened by the Governor."

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; he has that power now.

Mr. HARLAN. I think it is better to leave the territorial governments as the organic acts have fixed them. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope not.

Mr. HARLAN. What is the use of attempting to revise all the laws for the government of the Territories at this time?

Mr. RAMSEY. It is done by one dash of the pen. The Committee on Territories have had this subject under consideration, and they say this bill will result in saving $250,000 annually to the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a good bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. These Legislatures met time and again, and have nothing to do but simply receive their pay.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to insert in line five, after the word "years," the words "unless specially convened by the Governor of the Territory."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I have had some experience in Territories. I have lived in two Territories and helped to make two Territories into States; and I have never known any provision particularly authorizing the Governor to call special sessions. The power ought not to be in the hands of the Governor, because it will afford an opportunity to add greatly to the expenses of the territorial government, and there is no necessity for it in the Territories so far as my experience goes. I am in favor of biennial sessions. Some of the Territories have now only biennial sessions. The great objection in the Territories is to too much legislation. The less they have the better for the people. The bill is a good bill the way it is reported.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I was told a moment ago that my amendment was unnecessary because the Governor had already the power. I suppose they have under some of the territorial acts. As a matter of course, when you allow the Legislature to meet only once in two years you ought to make some provision for the possible emergencies which may arise. We know practically that they may arise.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to record my vote against that bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. Call for the yeas and nays, then.

Mr. HARLAN. I will ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEWART. That will break up a quorum.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that this bill be laid aside for a moment, while I take up a resolution that will give rise to no debate from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on laying the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MEDICAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senate to take up a resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee, which I think nobody will object to, making a direction about an appropriation.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary on the 22d instant:

Resolved, That under existing laws the balance of the appropriation of $60,000 made July 28, 1866, for the preparation, under the direction of the Secretary of War, of five thousand copies of the first volume of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, compiled by the Surgeon General, and the preparation and publication of a like number of the Medical Statistics of the Provost Marshal General's bureau, compiled and to be compiled by Surgeon J. H. Baxter, to wit, the sum of $19,736, must be applied exclusively to the latter work.

The resolution was adopted.

NEW JERSEY SOLDIERS' MONUMENTS.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to make a report of a little patriotic resolution and put it on its passage.

Mr. YATES. I rise to a question of order, whether the bill that was passed over informally a moment ago in relation to biennial sessions of the Legislatures of Territories does not come up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill has just been laid on the table.

Mr. YATES. No, sir; it was passed over informally.

Mr. RAMSEY. "Passed over informally" was the phrase used.

Mr. STEWART. The yeas and nays will be called on that, and there is not a quorum present. I hope the Senators will not insist upon it at present.

Mr. WILSON. We can get that up by and by. I want to pass a little resolution. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 358) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish cannon to Soldiers' Monument Associations of Pequonnock and Paterson, New Jersey, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to furnish to the Soldiers' Monument Associations of the township of Pequonnock, Morris county, New Jersey, and Paterson, Passaic county, New Jersey, each four pieces of cannon and twenty balls, in all eight pieces of cannon and forty balls, to be placed about those monuments.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had appointed Mr. J. M. ASHLEY, of Ohio, on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn, in place of Mr. H. E. PAINE, of Wisconsin, excused.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 637) to authorize the city of Washington to issue bonds for the purpose of paying the floating debt of the city.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions received from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 1454) making regulations as to the public debt—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 1455) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 1456) to authorize the importation of machinery for repair only, free of duty—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 767) to regulate the disposition of lands that may be hereafter granted to aid in the construction of railways—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 361) for the relief of Helen Lincoln and Heloise Lincoln, and for the withholding of money from tribes of Indians holding American captives—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to aid in relieving from peonage women and children of the Navajo Indians—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. NYE. I move to take up House bill No. 65.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarrahan. It proposes to confirm the tract of land known as the Panoche Grande rancho, in the State of California, granted by Governor Manuel Micheltorena to Vincente P. Gomez, in the year 1844, and by Gomez conveyed to William McGarrahan, on the 22d day of December, 1857, surveyed by the United States surveyor general for the State of California, and approved by him on the 11th of September, 1862, and which survey is now on file in the General Land Office, to William McGarrahan, upon the condition that McGarrahan shall, within twelve months, pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $1 25 per acre for the lands embraced within the survey. Upon the payment of this sum to the Treasurer of the United States by McGarrahan the Treasurer is to give a certificate therefor, and upon the presentation thereof to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a patent is to be issued to William McGarrahan for the lands.

Mr. NYE. I should like to have the report of the committee read.

Mr. CONNESS. That is very long.

Mr. COLE. It will take a long time to read it.

Mr. STEWART. The report recommends that the bill be indefinitely postponed. I therefore move, in accordance with the report of the committee, that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.

Mr. COLE. I call up the bill (H. R. No. 1206) to restore to certain parties their rights under the laws and treaties of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLE. The bill has been read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has been read and partly discussed.

Mr. HARLAN. I cannot consent that a bill of the importance of that measure shall be taken up at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to make a report from a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive that report.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the first clause of the amendment of the House to the eighth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the second clause of the amendment of the House to the eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out all of said second clause, to wit: four sections; and insert in lieu the following: "That the superintendent of the said Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb shall at the commencement of every December session of Congress make a full and complete statement of all the expenditures made by virtue of any appropriations by Congress. Said statement shall include the amount paid to said superintendent, and also for teachers, to whom paid, and the rate at which paid. And all expenditures for the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum shall be under the direction of the Surgeon General of the Army, who shall also report to Congress at every December session a full and accurate account of all expenditures made by said asylum out of appropriations by Congress; and all accounts for all appropriations made by Congress for charitable purposes, and for charitable institutions in the District of Columbia, shall be audited by the First Auditor of the Treasury. But nothing herein contained shall take from the Secretary of the Interior the jurisdiction he now has over the subject of charities and charitable institutions in the District of Columbia.

L. M. MORRILL,

J. W. PATTERSON,

A. McDONALD,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

R. P. SPALDING,

S. S. MARSHALL,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

WILLIAM W. STEWART,

HENRY WILSON,

C. R. BUCKALEW,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. BINGHAM,

J. B. BECK,

J. M. ASHLEY,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to call up the resolution fixing the pay of the newly-admitted Senators; and I submit to Senators that we ought to give the Secretary some direction in regard to it. These gentlemen want their pay. They ought to have it. The Secretary is utterly unable to pay them until he receives some direction from the Senate. I move to take up that resolution. We can dispose of it in a short time.

Mr. HARLAN. I am in favor of it; but I want to take up a little bill which will not occupy two minutes. I have been trying to get the floor for two days to call it up.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow this to be taken up, and then I will let it lay aside for that purpose.

Mr. HARLAN. Allow me to take this up, and I will give way.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well; take it so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves to take up the resolution in regard to the compensation of the newly admitted members.

Mr. COLE. I believe there was a motion pending.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us take up this resolution, and I will give way to Senators on both sides.

Mr. HARLAN. There is a little bill of five or six lines for the relief of a constituent of mine. It has passed the House, and I want it to pass the Senate in time to be signed. It will not take two minutes to pass it.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to make an inquiry of the Chair. Is not this in the nature of a privileged resolution? These gentlemen are here, entitled to some pay, under some rule, just as much as the rest of us; but they cannot get their pay. The Secretary does not know what to do. Is it not a matter of privilege?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We could pass them both while Senators are talking about it.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly. Now, I ask the Chair to give precedence to one or the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I supposed I recognized the Senator from New York first. I do not remember, but I think I did. The question is on his motion.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 417) to amend an act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by the said State of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico;

A bill (S. No. 487) to disapprove an act of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, redistricting the Territory, and reassigning the judges thereto;

A bill (S. No. 491) to provide for the appointment of recorder of deeds in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) to drop from the rolls of the Army certain officers absent without authority from their commands; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 163) appealing to the Turkish Government in behalf of the people of Crete.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1457) to pay for indexing the tax bill; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1458) to provide for the more economical administration of the government of the several Territories of the United States, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States;

A bill (H. R. No. 1021) in amendment of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1875) to transfer to the Department of the Interior certain powers and duties now exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with Indian affairs.

PAY OF SOUTHERN SENATORS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. TRUMBULL on the 21st instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the States of Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana, the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the Fortieth Congress.

The pending question was stated to be on the amendment proposed by Mr. DAVIS, to strike out all of the resolution after the word "Arkansas," in the third line, and insert:

The compensation allowed by law from the 22d day of June, 1868, and to the Senators from Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana, from the 25th day of June, 1868.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask my honorable friend from Kentucky to allow me to amend the original resolution by including South Carolina, which, it seems, is not there, and then his amendment will be equally appropriate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. To make the amendment commensurate with the rest?

Mr. CONKLING. Of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. The reason that I move the amendment, is simply this: by the legislation of Congress, and by the judgment of the Senate, those States were not entitled to elect Senators except from the time from which, according to the amendment, pay is directed to be made to them. The resolution called up by the Senator from New York proposes to pay those Senators from the 4th of March, 1867; that is eighteen months previous to the time when any of those States had the privilege to elect Senators according to the laws of Congress and according to the deliberate and repeated judgment of the Senate. Suppose a new State was admitted now into the Union, eighteen months after the commencement of the present Congress, when that new State elected Senators to Congress, would they be entitled to receive pay from the beginning of the Congress, or would they be entitled to receive pay only from the time that the State was admitted into the Union? Upon those two propositions there cannot be a doubt. This is an analogous case. I deny that there is any law of Congress, or any precedent of the Senate that authorizes the payment of Senators for eighteen months previous to the time that they were elected, and for eighteen months previous to the time that they were authorized by the laws of Congress to be elected.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I took the same view of this subject in the House of Representatives originally that he does; but I beg to ask him how he surmounts the precedent established in the case of Tennessee, which I understand to have been upon all-fours with this case, and where the Senate, after discussion, gave the same direction that is proposed in this resolution?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; that was not an analogous case, because the State of Tennessee had been represented in Congress during the whole of the rebellion in the one House or the other, or both.

Mr. CONKLING. Not during the whole of the rebellion.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, for three or four sessions. These other States, unless it be Louisiana, have not been represented in Congress at all during the war. But the single precedent is not sufficient to overrule the plain and legal principle of law.

Mr. BUCKALEW. And this is a Senate resolution?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; this is a resolution of the Senate, not a law. If I recollect aright, I am not certain, the case of Tennessee was provided for by law.

Mr. POMEROY. No; by a resolution of the Senate simply.

Mr. DAVIS. I care not whether it was by law or resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the Tennessee case I do not think there was an attempt to go back of the time of election. The election took place a good while before they were admitted.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not recollect that. I do not recollect the facts in relation to the case of Tennessee; but before the honorable Senator from New York can ask to have any force attached to that precedent he should examine the precedent itself and its circumstances in order to prove to the Senate that it is in conformity to the present case. But, sir, can any proposition be more unsound than that Senators shall be elected from States which therefore were not authorized to elect Senators, and that then for the eighteen months of time intervening between the commencement of Congress and their election they shall be entitled to receive pay? I do not think anything can be more unsound than that. It is upon this ground that I object to the passage of the resolution. I do not think it is sanctioned by any law or by any precedent.

Mr. THAYER. The Senator from Kentucky makes a distinction between the State of Tennessee and these other States on the ground, as he says, that Tennessee was represented in Congress during the war. It was not all the time. I have to state that during no portion of the Thirty-Ninth Congress did Tennessee have any representation.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Oh, yes; she was represented in the Thirty-Ninth. She had no representation in the Thirty-Eighth; but she had in the Thirty-Seventh.

Mr. THAYER. Exactly. Tennessee had no representation in either House during the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and not until the close of the Thirty-Ninth.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. The close of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth.

Mr. THAYER. When the present Senators were admitted, and the delegation were admitted in the other House about the same time, the pay of the members of the House and of the Senate, as I am informed by the Senator from Tennessee on my left, dated back to the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I believe that is true.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. THAYER. It is proposed now to apply the same rule to the delegation from each of these States which have actually been restored.

Mr. DAVIS. There is, if I understand the precedent correctly, this difference between that case and the case of the present Senators; I may be mistaken, however, in its conception. There were no Senators elected to the Senate from the State of Tennessee except the honorable Senator now in my eye and his colleague.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. That is so.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, that is the most important difference, or at least an important difference between the case of Tennessee and the case of the Senators who are intended to be provided for by the resolution pending. In each one of those States there had been an election of other gentlemen to the Senate.

Mr. THAYER. No other Senators were elected in these States since the commencement of the present Congress; that is, subsequent to the 4th of March, 1867. These are the only Senators who have been elected since that time.

Mr. DAVIS. That I understand; but there were two gentlemen elected from each one of these States previously, according to my recollection, from some of them I know, whose terms of service have not yet expired. I ask the honorable Senator from Nebraska if the term of service of any man who presented his credentials since the suppression of the rebellion from any of the States named in the resolution has yet expired? I suppose, if those Senators had been admitted to their seats in conformity to their credentials, that each senatorial seat would now be filled and occupied by a different gentleman from any of those who have been admitted here at the present session.

That, then, presents this state of facts: here were two Senators elected from each of these States. They presented themselves at the bar of the Senate with their commissions, their returns of election, and asked to be admitted to their seats. The terms of none of those Senators have yet expired. I do not know the fact certainly in relation to all of them, but I know it is the fact in relation to most of them. Now, when there had been a previous election according to the forms of the Constitution by the Legislatures of those several States, and the gentlemen elected from those States, or who professed to be elected from those States, came here with commissions of the Governors of those States under the great seal of the States, certifying that they were elected to the Senate according to the Constitution and laws, and their credentials were placed upon the table of the Senate, and those credentials still show the fact that their terms of service have not yet expired, the question is when other gentlemen who claim to have been elected since the first elections to which I have adverted and during the terms for which those elections had been made, and when these second gentlemen were not entitled to be elected by the Legislatures of the respective States at any time previous to the date set forth in my amendment, whether the Senate will pass a resolution to pay them for eighteen months previous to the time that they were elected, and previous to the time when, according to the laws of Congress, their respective States had the power to elect them. I think that nothing could be more unsound or more absurd.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is too large a question to be disposed of in a moment without reflection. It involves about half a million dollars. I trust Senators, while they are willing to do justice and be liberal to these new Senators and members, will remember that we cannot go beyond what is liberal and just without doing injustice to our constituents. If there are sixty of these gentlemen—and the same rule that is applied to Senators must be applied to members of the House—it will make nearly half a million dollars.

Mr. CONKLING. You do not mean half a million?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. I will state the question. The difference between the proposition of the Senator from New York and that of the Senator from Kentucky amounts to about sixteen months' pay, or nearly a year and a half's pay. Suppose it amounts $6,500 to each Senator and member. There are about sixty of them, as near as I can tell.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It amounts to $6,400, tax off, for each.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I was nearly right. The members and Senators of these States that will be entitled to representation during this Congress—for if they come in at the beginning of the next session the same rule will have to be applied—amount to at least sixty, and I think more.

Mr. DRAKE. Sixty-seven altogether.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, at $6,500 each, that makes $500,000. While I am disposed to be liberal to the new Senators and members, and am willing to go back to a reasonable time so as to cover their expenses, I do not think we should be justified in going back a year and a half. I think the rule prescribed by the Senator from Kentucky is fair, to give them their pay from the time when the State was first entitled to elect Senators and members. I am willing to go back as far as any one would think to be reasonable; but to go back beyond the time when the States could send these gentlemen here would be an excess of liberality at the expense of our constituents. We cannot afford it. The same rule that is involved in regard to Senators is involved in regard to members; and I am told the House is awaiting the action of the Senate on this question in order to fix the pay of their members.

Mr. STEWART. Move to amend it so as to make it commence from the beginning of this session.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I think the Senator from Kentucky has got it about right; that is from the time the States were entitled to elect Senators and Representatives, and not before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the time of the adoption of the constitutional amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kentucky goes a little beyond that. I am willing to go as far as he does. I will ask him what time he fixes.

Mr. DAVIS. I fix the time of the passage of the law that authorized the respective States to elect Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. That certainly is liberal enough, because these Senators could not be elected until that time. That goes back to the time within which they could be elected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When was that?

Mr. SHERMAN. In June. I suppose the resolution fixes it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make one remark in this connection. I think the subject may as well be disposed of now as at any time. We are acting upon a resolution of the Senate alone, and that resolution must be in conformity with the law regulating the compensation of members of Congress. If these gentlemen are to receive more than the existing law authorizes, let us have a resolution of the two Houses on the subject. It is a subject that belongs to the Senate and House. If you go outside of the present law, you must make a law either in the form of a bill or in the form of a joint resolution; and when that question comes up, I am willing to consider it. If the House sends us a proposition in the form of a law I am willing to take it up and act upon it and vote upon it now or at any future time; but at present we are passing a resolution of the Senate alone, and of course we cannot vote in this form any more money than is authorized by the existing law. That will only authorize the payment of the members from States that are entitled to representation in the Senate. In voting for this amendment I do not preclude my judgment in passing upon the general question when it is proper to be raised; but it would be monstrous for us by a resolution of the Senate alone to attempt to make a law and open the Treasury. We cannot do it. The accounting officers would be justified in refusing to execute it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported as proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution, if amended as proposed, will read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the State of Arkansas the compensation allowed by law from the 22d day of June, 1868, and to the Senators from Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana, from the 25th day of June, 1868, and to the Senators from South Carolina from the — day of —, 1868.

Mr. DRAKE. The Senators from South Carolina should be included with the Senators from Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana. They came in under the omnibus bill.

Mr. DAVIS. That is my understanding.

Mr. DRAKE. Just put in South Carolina with the others of the same date.

Mr. DAVIS. The Clerk can make that modification.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish it to be inferred from my calling up this resolution that I have any theory to sustain with regard to it; and it is due also to these gentlemen to say, as far as I have heard them express their opinion on this subject, that they have no theory about it. They only want the judgment of the Senate fixing what is due to them.

I have but one remark to make upon the merits of this question. When the case of Tennessee arose I was unable to see, as a member of the House, exactly the principle upon which the Senate acted. The Senate did fix, in spite of the remonstrance, I think, of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] and some other Senators, a rule in that case which is precisely the rule adopted by this resolution. I have in my hand the Journal of the Senate of 1866-67, from which it appears that—

"Mr. Harris, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of the Senate in relation to the payment of the Senators admitted from the State of Tennessee at the last session of Congress, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the State of Tennessee the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress."

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts

[Mr. SUMNER] offered an amendment expressive of the idea of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, as I understand, in these words:

"On motion by Mr. SUMNER, to amend the resolution by striking out the words 'commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress,' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'date of the resolution of Congress recognizing Tennessee as entitled to representation,' it was determined in the negative; and on the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative.

"So it was "Resolved"—

As I previously read. I have before me the debate in the Globe on this subject.

Mr. DRAKE. What was the date of that resolution?

Mr. CONKLING. The resolution was reported on the 4th of February, 1867, and it was disposed of finally on the 2d of March, 1867. There is the Journal if the Senator will take the trouble to look at it himself.

I have here the debate on this subject, which I have not the opportunity to look at carefully, but I find that these same considerations were presented, and I confess I am unable to see how the honorable Senator from Kentucky distinguishes Tennessee from this case by saying that Tennessee all the time retained representation in Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will permit me, if they were completely alike, and the precedent of Tennessee was exactly and literally in accordance with the present, and I had inadvertently voted in favor of that compensation to the Senators from Tennessee, I would be as ready, willing, and free to reverse that precedent and to vote against this principle as though it had never been set.

Mr. CONKLING. That I think is perfectly fair and perfectly just; and so I think should I feel free to vote; and yet it is due to all of us that we should understand precisely what this precedent is. Tennessee, I submit to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, was not represented through the rebellion in either House. He knows it was not represented here, and I know that Tennessee was not represented in the House of Representatives, of which I was then a member. On the contrary, the same hiatus which has occurred in the case of these States occurred in the case of Tennessee, not exactly so long, I admit. The present incumbent of the Presidency was here longer than representatives from Alabama, Louisiana, and Georgia lingered. Nevertheless, in theory of law and in point of fact, for every purpose now, the same interruption of representation occurred in the State of Tennessee as took place in the instance of these other States. Further than that, as the Senator will remember, Tennessee obliterated, so to speak, by her own act that government by virtue of which representation was originally enjoyed; and the act admitting Tennessee recited, I well remember, as its preamble, that the citizens of that State having adopted a constitution of government republican in form and ratified the same by a large majority, referring to the date, which was then recent, had become entitled to representation.

My honorable friend behind me [Mr. HENRICKS] says in a whisper they did not amend their constitution. I beg him to remember that they did; that they amended their constitution disqualifying large portions of their citizens from exercising the elective franchise, and that they came in under a special report made in advance by the Reconstruction Committee—and I am able to remember it because I happened myself to be a member—a report made in advance from the committee, I think, by the honorable Senator from Iowa, not now present, [Mr. GRIMES,] reciting the fact which I have specified, that they had amended their constitution or had set up a new constitution by a large majority of the votes cast, which constitution was republican in form, and therefore, in the language substantially which we adopted in the omnibus bill, so called, Tennessee was admitted. So that Senators will see that Tennessee stood on all fours with these States, having had representation, having lost or abandoned it, and having undergone a transmutation of State institutions.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] on that occasion, embracing the idea now suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, offered an amendment expressive of the same idea, and that was sustained on the one side and the other as the debate shows. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] deduced some analogy from his State, which had been a Territory, from which he had been chosen before statehood occurred, and his pay had reverted back. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] as the debate shows, drew his attention to distinctions between that case and the case then under consideration, and the judgment of the Senate maturely was that under the law as it stood those two Senators were entitled to a computation of pay commencing with the beginning of that Congress; and so the resolution passed.

Now, Mr. President, these gentlemen in whose behalf, in a certain sense, we are considering this question, turning back to the records, found this precedent, and they found no other analogous precedent, and so far as they have expressed any opinion or any wish, as far as I know on the subject, it is that their case fell within the Tennessee precedent, which it seems to me to do. But if Senators, exercising the right which I think the honorable Senator from Kentucky justly and properly claims, now, upon a more mature review of the premises, choose to reverse their judgment, certainly I am not here to contend against that. No doubt everybody will be content with precisely what is just.

I wish, however, to make one brief and passing suggestion on this subject. I will not venture to say anything as to the experience of the Senate; but in the House, where a death has occurred, where, from some unforeseen contingency, a district has been left unrepresented, and an election has taken place long after the commencement of the term, as far as I remember, for the last ten years in every instance the practice has been to allow the computation to be made nunc pro tunc, to allow them to count from the time when the Congress itself began. I know there is a distinction to be drawn which my honorable friend [Mr. DRAKE] very likely rises to draw between that case and the case of a district itself ineligible. That I admit.

Mr. DRAKE. I merely want to make this suggestion to the honorable Senator from New York, that by joint resolution of both Houses of Congress, standing on the statute-book for some time past, a Senator or Representative elected to fill a vacancy takes his pay from the time the vacancy occurs. That is by special law, a joint resolution of the two Houses now standing on the statute-book and operative.

Mr. CONKLING. If my honorable friend is right in that statement the fact which he states goes back but very little way; for I remember several instances in the case of my own colleagues, gentlemen from the State of New York, of special reports being made and special resolutions passed in order to enable them to do what the Senator says may be done under a general law. He will find, if he looks, that when there was no such general law, when the question was entirely open, the uniform practice of the House in such cases was to allow the computation to go back to the commencement of the Congress; that is, in other words, the commencement of the term. Now, sir, there may be distinctions to be drawn between that case and this; very likely there are, but the Tennessee case, I submit, is on all fours with this, and upon that much experience—I know of no other—it is for Senators to say what they think of the whole ground.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I rise to answer the Senator upon the analogy. He is mistaken entirely upon it. Compensation was paid until recently only at the date of the session of Congress. Payments were not made between times until recently. There was no authorized, regular session before the first Monday in December. Consequently, at the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress these gentlemen from Tennessee took their seats and served a part of that session. There has been no meeting of Congress during the previous spring or summer during all that time.

Mr. CONKLING. If my honorable friend will allow me a moment, my recollection is that in 1856 the law was passed under which we now receive compensation, except that two years ago an addition of $2,000 was made, which provision was that the pay should be $3,000 a year, being so much a month, and from that day to this the pay has been drawn monthly by those who chose to do it, whether there was or was not a session of Congress.

Mr. BUCKALEW. No, sir; it was not drawn between the sessions of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. Until when?

Mr. BUCKALEW. We passed a measure within a couple of years past authorizing it to be paid in that way. Mr. President, the Senators from Tennessee appeared at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress; although they did not serve the whole of that session, it was held that we could not split it, and we paid them what was paid to other members for that session, and counting from the beginning of Congress, as the law then stood, was substantially counting for the session that they were present. In the case before us, the proposition is to go back and pay for a former service at a former session when these members were not here at all. The cases are radically different, the law having no application to this case, whereas it would have an application to the former.

There is another consideration upon the point I am on—the Senator's analogy—and that is that these cases come up under the reconstruction laws, the first of which was passed on the 2d of March, last year, the second on the 23d of March, the third one in July, and one or two at the present session. None of these reconstruction laws with reference to the right of these States to representation was in existence when the case of the State of Tennessee was before us, and there was then a general legal presumption that that State was entitled to representation in Congress according to Mr. Lincoln's idea, and it was held, when the Senators appeared here at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, that we could not split that session under the law. Now, I insist that upon both of these grounds the distinction is wide between these cases and the former.

Mr. THAYER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will perceive that there is this analogy between the case of Tennessee and the case of these States in reference to reconstruction: the Senators and Representatives from Tennessee were not admitted until a joint resolution had passed both Houses restoring Tennessee to representation. The Senators and Representatives were admitted immediately under that joint resolution.

The objection that the accounting officers of the Treasury will not pass an account for the payment of these Senators is met by the fact that in the case of the Senators and Representatives of Tennessee they did pass precisely similar accounts for the payment of those Senators back to the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. The cases are precisely similar.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am willing to pay these members their compensation upon some reasonable and right principles, but I am not able to see how it is proper to pay them when they were not elected, and when Congress held by express law that the States were not entitled to representation.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Before the Senator goes on I wish to call attention to one thing. For every day of the session that a member of the Senate is absent he is required to report his absence, and his pay is deducted for that time.

If a gentleman now present had been absent during the first session of the Fortieth Congress he would have been required to deduct his pay for the whole time. Here are men who were never here at all during that session, and they are to receive pay, while in the case of men who were entitled to be here, elected Senators, their pay is to be deducted for absence, unless in case of sickness. Think of that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. By express law Congress said these States were not entitled to representation, and that they would not be entitled to representation until they became reconstructed, and the last act of reconstruction was the submission to Congress of the constitution that they might adopt, and the approval of that constitution by Congress, and a declaratory resolution of course had to express the approval of Congress. Then Congress said they would be entitled to representation. Until that time they were not entitled to representation. Individually I do not agree to that; that is not my judgment; but that is the law as declared by Congress; at least as much of law as Congress can make out of a thing of that sort. That stands as the law of the question. How Senators then can be paid for a time that they did not hold the office at all, and for a time when the States were not entitled to representation, is more than I can understand. In the case of Tennessee, when that question was up, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] said that that could not be considered a precedent hereafter. During the debate that was said, for the reason that Tennessee was recognized as entitled to the right of representation from the time that she ratified the constitutional amendment.

Mr. YATES. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana if it would not be more generous and consistent in him, who believes these States to be in the Union and entitled to representation, and that there was a vacancy, to stand up to the doctrine for which he contends and say these Senators should be entitled to their pay, than to plant himself upon the platform of the other side of the House, and draw his conclusions from that?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I could not do that, for the Senator will see at once there were other Senators accredited to this body under the State governments that I believe in, and they were entitled, as I claim, to the seats here, and that claim prima facie shown by credentials rested upon the table of the Senate until the Senate decided that these Senators might take their seats.

Mr. YATES. But as matter of fact they have not been recognized as Senators and have never taken their seats. If anybody is entitled to the pay it is the gentlemen who are acknowledged to be Senators.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But the Senator is insisting that I shall argue it from my standpoint. If I could argue it from my standpoint of course I should be compelled to say they cannot be paid. Until Congress in some way declared these prior elections not valid, prima facie these other men were entitled to their seats, because their credentials lay upon our table. But taking the law as it reads they are elected under that. Now, why in the world pay them when you say they were not entitled to representation? It is monstrous. You might as well say that a Senator coming for the first time from a State might draw his pay from the organization of the territorial government, at least from the time they took steps to form a State government when they culled their convention; you might say that from that time they should be paid. I am willing to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, although I think the right doctrine is that men should be paid from the time they hold the office. I do not see how it is that a man can be paid when he does not hold the office.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to ask the Senator a question on that point. The members of the House from Arkansas were elected in March, for example; in Alabama they were elected in February, a month before. Now, if we go back to the time when the men were elected, it would establish an inequality between that House and this. That is very clear. Take the State of Kentucky, where they elect in August; in California they elect in September. Nobody doubts that their pay goes back to the time when the Congress begins; and if you take the date of election the members of the other House would not draw their pay from the time when this Congress commenced, the 4th of March. Now, we certainly ought not to establish a rule here which will lead to an inequality between the members of the two Houses.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not care about adopting that rule. I guess the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky is nearly right. I am willing to vote for that, and that will be uniform in regard to all these parties; but I wish to state a difference between this and the Tennessee case. We recognized by the resolution admitting Tennessee to representation her right to representation at the time the Senators were elected, and for a period before that. I think if Senators will look back to the preamble of the resolution they will see that Congress by that resolution recognized the right of Tennessee to representation for a period before the time that those Senators drew their pay; and, as a matter of fact, those Senators were here, I think, for about fourteen months asking their seats. We finally gave them their seats and went back of their election two months. I expect that was a mistake to that extent; but certainly they were entitled to pay from the time of their election, which was fourteen months before they took their seats; and the time covered by the pay is recognized as within the time when they were entitled to representation.

Mr. STEWART. If it is in order, I move to amend the amendment by making the pay begin at the commencement of the present session of Congress. It seems to me that there is a principle in that. Many of the members of Congress were elected during the winter, and the House will apply the same rule. Certainly this will come within the rule in the Tennessee case, and will come within a safe precedent for the construction of the rule as given by the Senator from Pennsylvania. Certainly it will come within that; and I think that is about fair. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, to strike out the words "the Fortieth Congress" and insert "the present session of Congress."

Mr. DRAKE. They were not elected until June.

Mr. STEWART. The members of the House were elected in March.

Mr. DRAKE. Let the House settle that matter for themselves.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I see no sort of consistency in the proposition of the Senator from Nevada. If we are going back at all, we may just as well go back to the commencement of the present Congress. The idea upon which we have always proceeded in these cases, since we have had a salary, is when there is a vacancy to pay from the time it occurred; but that was where the State itself was entitled to representation. Here in these cases we have adopted throughout on this side of the Chamber entirely different principles. We have said that these States were not entitled to representation, and we have said that they were out of practical relations to the Union, so that they could not be represented in Congress. Therefore that idea fails entirely, and if we pay these gentlemen from the time of the commencement of Congress, or from the time of the commencement of the present session, we are just giving the lie to all we have said. We are acting upon one principle with regard to admission and another principle with regard to pay. I am unwilling to put myself in that category.

I do not see any objection to the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, because it assumes that they were entitled to representation from that particular date, and I am perfectly willing to take it, although I think the more proper principle to adopt would be from the date of the adoption of the fourteenth article, which fixes the right of representation from that time, and up to which time we did not recognize the right as existing. However, the difference is so small that I am perfectly willing to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. YATES. I do not understand myself that there has been any particular rule on the subject. My understanding of the practice is that where there is a vacancy by death, resignation, or for any other reason, the person who fills the office is entitled to the pay from the time that vacancy occurs. That is a positive law, as the Senator from Missouri well remarked? Are we to go back, in fixing the salary or the compensation of Senators, and determine the question whether the State was entitled to representation or not? Are we supposed to be governed by any such consideration as that? The question simply is: were the States represented? Were there Senators in Congress from those States? Has there been a vacancy? Who now fills the vacancy? Who occupies the places which should have been occupied by the Senators from those States? That is the question, and the only question.

I am utterly opposed to applying any technical rules to the Senators elected from these newly-reconstructed States, and going back to decide the question raised by the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Kentucky, whether they are right in their views that the States were in the Union or not. I believe that when a party like ourselves have the power we should be governed by rules of our own construction and the rules of justice. These States have not been represented; the Senators are here filling the time and the period for which they should have been represented, and I am for paying them for the time named in the original resolution; that is, from the commencement of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator one question, then. Some of them come here merely to fill out a vacant term that has been vacant all the time. For instance, they come here during the third Congress of the term instead of first. Nobody was here from the State at the first, and nobody at the second. Why not pay them for all the terms?

Mr. YATES. I say there never has been any rule on the subject; and I say that a narrow construction should not be applied to the Senators elected to fill vacancies of this kind. These Senators are here representing States which should have been represented; and now I do not propose to go back and apply the doctrines of President Johnson and the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Kentucky, and say we will cut off our own Senators who come here and are entitled to the pay while these States were not represented. There is no justice in it; there is no propriety in it. We shall deserve the contempt and the censure of the country if we yield to any such doctrine as that, according to my notion. If we adopt the rule that they shall be squared down and measured down to the very days that they have been here since they have taken their seats it will be a new rule, a rule which has never been applied heretofore. I hope the Senate will allow these men to receive their compensation in accordance with the precedent heretofore adopted by the Senate. There is no use, to my notion, of hesitating about a matter of justice and propriety, as I say this is. I cannot see any reason whatever for hesitation.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Will the Senator allow me to read a section of the existing law on this subject of compensation?

Mr. YATES. I am through.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This is the law:

"It shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House and Secretary of the Senate, respectively, to deduct from the monthly payments of members herein provided"—

Providing that the salaries shall be paid month by month—

"For the amount of his compensation for each day that such member shall be absent from the House or Senate, respectively, unless such Representative, Senator, or Delegate shall assign as a reason of such absence the sickness of himself or some member of his family."

Does the Senator from Illinois perceive that a member from a State entitled to representation who did not attend at the first session of this Congress in March, April, July, and November would get no pay at all, and a member from a State not entitled to representation who did not attend under his doctrine would get pay for the whole time? Can anything be more absurd under the laws that regulate this subject?

Mr. YATES. The States were not entitled because of the prevalence of such doctrines as those contended for by the Senator from Pennsylvania. They were entitled to representation; they would have been represented but for the Democratic party; and now, in behalf of the Republican party, I contend that the men who fill these vacancies should be paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DRAKE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and at the conclusion of the call read the list, which was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Sprague, Sumner, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Harris, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomroy, Ramsey, Rice, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Yates—21.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I rise to a question of order or of parliamentary law. The members whose compensation is voted upon cannot vote; but some of them have voted on this amendment.

I suppose it was by inadvertence. I did not care to interrupt the roll-call. I make the point, however, before the result is announced. Under the rules no member of the body can vote on a question in which he is directly interested.

Mr. ANTHONY. According to that point I should like to know how any Senator or Representative could vote on the question of increasing his salary, as we did two or three years ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no rule on the subject.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Do I understand the Chair to decide against the point of order? I should like to have the rule or the principle of parliamentary law read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that there is any rule about it. Senators vote on the question of fixing their own pay, and have raised their pay since I have been a member here two or three times, and all voted on the question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I submit to the Chair that it is a different question. Of course we vote general appropriation laws and general laws fixing compensation; but this is a resolution of the Senate voting specifically certain pay to certain members.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the decision of the Senate. It is one not embraced in any of our rules. The question is whether it is in order for Senators who will receive compensation under this resolution to vote.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY. I understand the question is whether it is in order for these gentlemen to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Is it in order for those interested in the resolution to vote? Those who are of the opinion that it is in order will answer yeas as their names are called; and those opposed nay.

Mr. ABBOTT. I wish to inquire whether the Senators from those States are to vote on this motion. My name was called and I voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is another point of order.

Mr. ABBOTT. I do not understand why we may not vote on this question as well as any Senator may vote on the question of raising his pay or anything else that comes before the Senate in the way of money, mileage, or anything of that kind. If my name is called I shall vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk commenced to call the roll; and Mr. ABBOTT responded in the affirmative.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask the Chair to state the question. Perhaps there is a misapprehension of what the question is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Are the members who are to be compensated by this resolution entitled to vote? Those who are of opinion that they are entitled will say yeas, those opposed will say nays, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ABBOTT. I withdraw my vote under the circumstances.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to ask a question for information. I desire to know whether the Senate did not in the case of Mr. Stockton, of New Jersey, decide that he could not vote upon the question of his election being declared null and void.

Mr. SUMNER. It did.

Mr. DRAKE. If that is so, it seems to me that this case stands in direct analogy to that. I desire to state that I do not wish to interfere with anything that is proper and right toward these gentlemen, but I cannot see my way clear to vote for their compensation back to the beginning of this Congress.

Mr. NYE. I propose in a word to show that it is perfectly in order for these gentlemen to vote on this question. This is a legislative question entirely, upon which every Senator on this floor has a right to vote and may be compelled to vote. It is a question for these gentlemen to decide for themselves whether they choose to vote or not. It is simply a question of what compensation they shall have. I think there is a difference between this case and the Stockton case. In that case the question was not a legislative question as to the amount of money to be voted, but whether Mr. Stockton was elected by his Legislature at home. In that case the Senate held that he was not entitled to vote, because it was a question affecting his right to a seat here. If there is any analogy between this question and any question that has been up, it is between this case and the case where we voted to raise our own pay. That was a legislative question, and so is this. I am surprised that the Senator from Pennsylvania should have raised this question, both on the ground of propriety and upon the ground of right. Of course it is an embarrassing situation for these men, but it is a question on which this body would have a right to compel their vote. I hope the Senate will overrule the point of order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the Stockton case the question was whether the Senator was entitled to his office; but in the present case the question is whether certain parties in this body are entitled to certain money. In the Stockton case it was claimed that Mr. Stockton was entitled to vote because he was not supposed to have an interest in the office; but it was a question of public interest, the right of a State to be represented in the person she selected. In this case the question is whether certain gentlemen are entitled to certain sums of money, not according to existing law, but according to the will of the Senate; whether they shall have a sum of money voted to them before they held the office for which they are entitled to compensation; whether they shall have a sum of money for services before the time when Congress by law said their States were entitled to representation, and in that question their States and the public have no interest, except as the public is interested in seeing to it that money is not taken out of the Treasury improperly. The interest of the public is not the same as their interest. In the Stockton case the public interest was presumed to be as the interest of the Senator whose credentials made a prima facie right for him. Here is a direct question of personal interest in a sum of money to be voted by the Senate, as much so as if there were a private bill pending to pay money to a Senator. Now, could a Senator vote upon a private bill voting money to himself? It is too clear; it is too plain for question. This is a resolution that out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or out of the public Treasury, if it be made a joint resolution, there shall be paid each man a sum of money; and the entire sum is about half a million dollars. That is the question; not whether they shall be paid according to law, but paid beyond the law by the special favor of the Senate.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Indiana to argue that in the Stockton case it was right and proper and allowable, where the question was whether a Senator was entitled to a seat, for him to vote. He thinks that where the question was not merely one of pay, but whether a man was entitled to a seat in the Senate, the interest was not such as to disqualify him from voting. There the question was whether he was entitled to a seat in the Senate. The Senate was called on to decide whether the forms and ceremonies by which he was elected were regular and proper. The Senator from Indiana thinks there was no disqualifying interest in him in such a case; that he could vote to decide that he was entitled to a seat in the Senate, and that he was entitled to all the pay and emoluments resulting from such a seat in the Senate; and yet when the simple question arises as to whether a Senator shall vote on the amount of pay which he is to receive the Senator from Indiana thinks he is disqualified. It is a question upon which there has been no doubt heretofore—according to the history of the Senate—from the beginning of the Government down to the present time; and the Senator from Indiana himself has repeatedly voted upon that question in which he was directly and personally interested, whether his pay should be raised or not. And yet he would now disqualify these Senators from voting when he would say that a candidate for the Senate had a right to decide upon the merits of his own election.

Mr. President, were not Senators interested when the pay of Senators was raised by our own votes? Their constituents were interested in seeing that as much of the public money should be saved as possible, and that they should receive just as little as possible. We voted on that question, although we were personally and directly interested. I voted for the increase of my own pay. It was so much against the Government; it was so much against the people of the United States; it was so much against the Treasury; it was for my individual interest in a certain sense; but it was a legislative act, as this has been already denominated. I not only had a right to vote, but I was compelled to vote. If I received the pay I was compelled to take the responsibility of my vote for or against receiving that pay. There can be no question about a proposition so plain. These Senators have just the same right to vote for fixing their pay that we had to vote for our increased compensation, and the Senator from Indiana will in vain attempt to draw a distinction. The same interest would have applied to him if he had been present and voting on that question, which would apply to these Senators.

Mr. President, I hope that such a distinction will not be drawn against the new Senators from these States, that their votes will not be questioned, when such votes have never been questioned in all the history of the past legislation of the country.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I believe there were but one or two of the Senators who have recently come to the Chamber that voted, and, as I understood it, they did not vote until the Clerk waited, in consequence of there not being a quorum, to have the number filled. It seems to me that there is a difference between the case of our passing a law here which indirectly affects every man who votes for it and giving construction to a law directly to affect the person who votes upon it. Every law we pass affects us as citizens of the United States. When we voted the compensation for Senators it affected us and those who succeed us. This is giving construction to the act applicable to the individuals who vote upon it, and it does seem therefore to me that there is greater propriety in those interested not voting. I move, Mr. President, to lay this question of order on the table.

Mr. DRAKE. That cannot be done.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to make an explanation to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. YATES.] The honorable Senator tells us that his constituents are interested in seeing that he gets the least amount of money from the public Treasury possible. Well, I will tell my honorable friend that the interests of my constituents are different; they are interested, and very much interested, in seeing that I get a fair and full compensation for my services here. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, on the question now before the Senate as to whether it is in order for these gentlemen to vote upon this question, I desire simply to refer to the Journal of the Senate and show just what was done in the case that I referred to awhile ago. It is as I supposed it, though it occurred before I came into the Senate. The case arose in the Senate in the year 1866. The question was on a resolution that "John P. Stockton was duly elected and is entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865." It was determined in the affirmative. I now read from the Journal of the Senate of Monday, March 26, 1866, page 270:

"On motion by Mr. POLAND, that the Senate reconsider its vote on Friday last agreeing to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That John P. Stockton was duly elected and is entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865."

"It was determined in the affirmative; and

"The question recurring upon said resolution,

"Mr. SUMNER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the vote of Mr. Stockton be not received in determining the question of his seat in the Senate."

"The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the said resolution; and

"On motion by Mr. SHERMAN, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report on Thursday next;

"It was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 22.

"On motion of Mr. JOHNSON,

"The yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the Senators present,

"Those who voted in the affirmative are,

"Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley.

"Those who voted in the negative are,

"Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Yates.

"On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative."
 "So it was."
Resolved, That the vote of Mr. Stockton be not received in determining the question of his seat in the Senate."

I have simply to say that if the Senate would be consistent in its rulings it seems to me there is no other way but to decide this question of order against the right of these gentlemen to vote.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, there is important business in executive session.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. WILSON. If my colleague will give way, I desire to make a motion. I move to refer this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary. ["Oh, no!"] It will give an opportunity to reflect on this subject for a few hours and get it right.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say a single word. This question of order is, perhaps, more troublesome to dispose of than the other question if we were to come to a vote on that. It seems to me this is very plain. If the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who was elected before the beginning of this Congress, had been upon a voyage in Europe all this time and had now just appeared in the body, the question would arise what compensation should he have. His compensation would commence from the time that he appeared here. In relation to these gentlemen who come here just elected from these States, the theory on this side of the Chamber is that the States themselves have been abroad and just got back. Now, when shall their compensation commence? It seems to me, and I appeal to these gentlemen themselves, as well as to every other member of the Senate, that the fair, honest thing is to say that the compensation shall begin when they took the office, when the States got back. They have been abroad. The idea of giving them compensation when they have not been here, when, if it had been the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from New Jersey or the Senator from California, if they had been abroad, traveling in Europe, and not been here, it would not have been allowed, seems to me very unjust as a principle. Let the time be fixed, either the time when they come and take the office or the time when their State was ready to elect them to the office; fix it one or the other. That would seem to be fair. I think these gentlemen themselves should be better satisfied with that construction, as I think it is the fairer construction to be given to the law than any other.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARLAN. I will ask my honorable friend if he will not give way in order to let me take up a little bill?

Mr. SUMNER. I have given way for the last half hour.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest a question of order, whether, when an appeal has been taken from the decision of the Chair, the yeas and nays have been called, and the result not yet announced, it is competent to submit a motion to go into executive session. The yeas and nays are being called; the vote has not been announced. Can it be, when we are in that condition, and a question arises whether some Senator has a right to vote, which runs into a question of order, the vote not yet being announced, a member can rise and make a motion for an executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this occasion to present the business on his table.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENTS.

The bill (H. R. No. 1458) to provide for the more economical administration of the government of the several Territories of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. RAMSEY. I ask that that bill be considered at once. It is the same bill which we had up some time ago as a Senate bill, and passed almost to a final vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I raise the question whether we can do that in the situation the Senate is now?

Mr. CHANDLER. By unanimous consent. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. HARLAN. I must object unless Senators will take up a little bill that I desire to have considered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it in order to move to lay the whole subject on the table?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I made that motion some time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing is in order until the Chair has cleared his table of the documents on it. The bill that has been read twice will lie on the table.

INDEXING TAX BILL.

The bill (H. R. No. 1457) to pay for indexing the tax bill was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOWE. If there is no objection I should like to have that put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection it will be put on its passage.

Mr. HARLAN. I shall have to object.

COMMERCIAL LAWS IN ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes.

On motion by Mr. CHANDLER, it was Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives on the said bill, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. MORRILL of Maine, and Mr. DOOLITTLE.

EXECUTIVE EXPENSES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask consent to make a report from a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first and second amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

L. M. MORRILL,
 JAMES HARLAN,
 A. H. CRAIGIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
 W. H. KELSEY,
 WILLIAM B. STOKES,
 L. W. ROSS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is a motion pending which I made to lay the subject before the Senate on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. My motion will supersede that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to go into executive session has priority.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a privileged question. I send to the Chair the credentials of General George E. Spencer, Senator-elect from the State of Alabama. I move that they be read, and the oath of office administered to him.

The credentials of Hon. George E. Spencer, elected by the Legislature of the State of Alabama a Senator from that State for the term ending March 3, 1873, were read; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. SPENCER, he took his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 16) donating a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation for the exclusive use of a public road, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 576) relating to the district courts of Utah Territory;

A bill (S. No. 604) regulating the times and places of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida; and

A bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York to change its location.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 598) for the relief of Mary Scott;

A bill (S. No. 606) granting a pension to Robert Watson;

A bill (S. No. 630) granting an increase of pension to Nancy A. Stokes;

A bill (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Nancy Smith;

A bill (S. No. 634) granting a pension to Violet Henry;

A bill (S. No. 637) to authorize the city of Washington to issue bonds for the purpose of paying the floating debt of the city;

A bill (S. No. 442) to amend section one of an act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to admit certain persons to the Naval Academy; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 172) to construe an act entitled "An act to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core."

PAY OF SOUTHERN SENATORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] is before the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 396, for the relief of Samuel Tibbetts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I rise to a question of order. The Senate is in the act of voting upon a proposition. That proposition is whether certain Senators are entitled to vote upon the question before the body. The yeas and nays are being called. Pending the call of the yeas and nays a question of order arises. That question of order the Chair submits to the body, instead of deciding it himself. My point of order is that until that call for the yeas and nays be completed by the announcement of the result it is not in order to call up any independent business.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no doubt that the Senator's point of order is well taken, and I will make no contest over that; but I will ask unanimous consent of the Senate, and throw myself on the courtesy of the Senator himself and state the case. This man has paid twice for his land, and the bill is to remit one payment.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that bill will be taken up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will waive the question of order for that if it is a distressing case. But the Senator from Massachusetts has submitted a proposition, and I make the point of order upon his proposition, that the Senate cannot pass from one class of business to another pending a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a certain priority of business that is settled by our rules. I do not understand that this is one of those cases. The call of the yeas and nays had not commenced when the debate arose, and I suppose any Senator having the floor may move to proceed to any other business he pleases.

Mr. ABBOTT. I rise to a point of order, sir; that the yeas and nays having been called on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, the vote was not announced by the Chair.

Mr. HARLAN. This bill could have passed in this time.

Mr. ABBOTT. The point of the Senator from Pennsylvania was made before the result was announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The fact that the yeas and nays were being called does not alter the position of the case; only when the question arises again the yeas and nays will have to be called over. The fact that the yeas and nays have been ordered does not give this business priority.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Chair will indulge me. That is not the point. The yeas and nays had been called and a question of order was raised as to whether one or more of the Senators who had answered could answer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not remember whether the vote was announced or not. The yeas are 17, and the nays 21—

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Chair cannot announce the result of this vote until the Senate, upon the point made, decides whether certain Senators—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true, the question of order was prior to all others.

SAMUEL TIBBETTS.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not understand that anybody objects to taking up the bill I have mentioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves now to consider the bill mentioned by him. Is there any objection to taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from Iowa? ["No!"]

The bill (H. R. No. 396) for the relief of Samuel Tibbetts was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $200 to Samuel Tibbetts, being for money paid by him for the entry of land upon which he had before located a land warrant, and which warrant, before a patent was issued, had been lost by the officers of the land office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF SOUTHERN SENATORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I again renew my motion, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I renew my question of order, that until the result of the vote he announced the Senator cannot submit another proposition, any more than if the Secretary were in the middle of the roll-calling. There can be no business having priority over it. There is no motion that possibly can be made which can cut off the calling of the roll, and that is not completed until the Chair announces the result. That announcement cannot be made until the question of order raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania has been decided, because the Chair cannot decide whether certain votes are to be counted until the Senate settles that question of order.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to enter a motion that this whole matter be referred to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to consider it and report on it, so that we may get over this difficulty.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know if we can refer a question of order to a Contingent Expenses Committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to see why the Senate cannot go into executive session at any time a Senator gets the floor and makes a motion for that purpose. The Chair thinks the motion can be put and decided as the Senate pleases.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make one remark. I shall have no objection to making the disposition of this subject proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] after simply reading the parliamentary rule to which I referred, and if the Chair will permit me I shall take but a moment.

Mr. SUMNER. Is the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I must insist upon its being put.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am so confident of the point I make that I will raise the question of order, and ask the decision of the Chair that I may take an appeal, though then we have two questions of order before the body at the same time, and that is rather a queer state of things. I appeal from the decision of the Chair if the Chair holds that pending the call of the roll the Senator from Massachusetts may submit a motion that we proceed to the consideration of executive business while the Senate is dividing, and on the appeal I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. Is my motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable, but there is an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair. The Chair decides that when a Senator has the floor at any stage of proceedings he may move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. If a Senator has a right to the floor, he has a right to make that motion.

Mr. SUMNER. Precisely, as he may make a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; and if the Senate go into executive session, and even come out again, they will find the business just where they left it. An appeal is taken from the decision of the Chair, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am of opinion—

Mr. SUMNER. Is it debatable?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly, the appeal is debatable. I am of opinion that the Chair is right in the decision, for if it be true that you cannot move to proceed to the consideration of executive business you cannot move to adjourn, and the question of order raised on the validity of these votes is a question that might be discussed for a week, and you could not adjourn at all if the doctrine is true. If you have commenced the call of the yeas and nays and a question of order is raised as to the validity of some of the votes, whether they are to be counted or not counted, as a question of order it might lead to a discussion that would take us a week, and according to the present doctrine of the Senator from Indiana you could not interpose a motion to adjourn. A motion for an executive session is a motion that can be made by any person who has the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. POMEROY. What is the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The decision of the Chair is that a member may move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business whenever he has the floor, and if the Senate agree to his motion, when the executive session is over the business will be resumed in the same position as it was when the Senate went into executive session.

Mr. DRAKE. Is not the question this: whether a Senator can move to go into executive session while the Senate is dividing by the yeas and nays, and the vote has not been announced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question involves this difficulty, who is to be called, and when have you got through the call? That is the real point.

Mr. SUMNER. I must insist on my motion for an executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators argue that the roll was called through; other Senators say that members were called who were not entitled to vote; and that is the difficulty. That is the question to be decided.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The roll was called through on another question, and not on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, I think. My name is pretty low down on the list, and I know I did not vote on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not remember that he announced the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky; but his recollection is that an objection was immediately taken to the vote, inasmuch as gentlemen had voted who were not entitled to vote, and the decision was arrested by that objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I must insist upon my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. I understand the vote has not been announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the appeal, and the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before voting upon this question, I wish to state what I consider the proper disposition of the matter before us. The Senate was voting upon an amendment moved by the Senator from Kentucky. The yeas and nays were called nearly or quite through. There could be and was but one thing to be done, and that was for the Presiding Officer to announce that vote. The Senator from Pennsylvania could not raise a question while the vote was being taken as to the right of a Senator to vote. After the vote was taken and announced, he might then raise that question; but no question can be raised while the yeas and nays are being called, and you cannot pile up one appeal upon another or one question of order upon another. One question of order must be decided and finished before you can raise a second question of order, otherwise you would go on ad infinitum; there would be no end to the questions of order which might be raised. One gentleman could raise one question, and while that was under consideration another Senator could raise another, and there would be no end. You can have but one question of order at a time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest right here that when the vote was taken the objection was made that certain Senators having a right to seats on the floor were not entitled to vote. The Chair could not announce the vote until that question was decided.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My answer to that is this: that question could not be raised pending the call. The Senator from Pennsylvania had no right to raise the question of the right of any person whose name is on the roll to vote while the call was pending. After the call was through, and the vote was announced, it would then have been competent for the Senator from Pennsylvania to introduce a proposition to change that vote, or to strike out the name of some person who had no right to vote; but I insist that pending the vote no question can be raised as to the right of a Senator to vote, and if the Senate will reflect they will remember that that was the way in the Stockton case. Mr. Stockton voted; his vote was counted; and the result was announced, and after it was announced a Senator made a motion to reconsider the vote upon the ground that Mr. Stockton had no right to vote in his own case, and the Senate did reconsider it. In my judgment, the duty of the Chair simply would be to announce the result of the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, and then if the Senator from Pennsylvania wants to raise a question as to whether certain persons are entitled to vote or not that can be decided.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Illinois is mistaken in the question of order upon which I took an appeal. The Senate is in the act of dividing; the roll-call is quite completed or nearly; but the result is not announced, so that the Senate is still in the very act of voting. Pending that, the Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate go into executive session. My question of order is that he cannot make that motion at that stage of the business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I quite agree with the Senator from Indiana on that point. That is another question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Chair decides that he can make that motion, and from that decision I appeal.

Mr. THAYER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion for an executive session, with the understanding that we vote at once on the question whether these Senators are entitled to vote or not, and then on the original resolution as to their pay without any discussion whatever? If we do that we shall save time. We are wasting hour after hour here in this wrangle.

Mr. SUMNER. But who is there that can speak for the Senate?

Mr. THAYER. Let it be understood by unanimous consent.

Mr. SUMNER. And so that there shall be no debate on the question?

Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. Who is there that can speak for the Senate? Can the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THAYER. If any one objects to that understanding, let him make the objection now. I make the suggestion in order to get out of this difficulty at once.

Mr. THAYER and others. Let us vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll on the appeal.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the shortest way is to insist on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? and on this question the roll will be called.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Chandler, Corbett, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, and Van Winkle—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Ferry, Harris, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Patterson of Tennessee, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cattell, Cole, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Spencer, Vickers, Wade, Welch, Whyte, and Willey—23.

So the decision of the Chair was overruled.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now I insist that the Chair announce the vote on the question upon which the yeas and nays were called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a question of order raised on that vote, and that is the question now under consideration, whether it is in order for gentlemen who are interested in the resolution to vote.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now I desire to read what I proposed to present a moment ago.

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. President, I insist on the Chair announcing the vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. Nothing is in order until that is announced. The vote has been taken, the yeas and nays have been called, but the result has not yet been announced.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I was addressing the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to vote on the amendment whenever it is in order for me to do so.

Mr. ABBOTT. I raise the point of order which I have just stated.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The roll was called through, and I, as soon as it was in order, not to produce confusion, raised the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rise to a question of order, and call the Senator from Pennsylvania to order, upon the ground that no remarks are in order while the Senate is being divided until the vote is announced.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I understand that the Senator from Illinois has exercised the privilege of making remarks several times, and I propose to respond to him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I raise the question of order that no remarks from anybody are in order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask the Chair whether the question is not that submitted by him to the Senate, Are the votes objected to by me in order? Is not that the question? If so, I propose addressing the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question arose in this way: the roll was called, and a difficulty arose as to the votes of certain Senators whose votes were objected to. The Chair did not understand that that question was settled, or that the roll was called through. If it had been it would be the business of the Chair to announce the vote. He did not so understand it because a question of order was raised right there as to whether certain gentlemen were entitled to vote.

Mr. BUCKALEW. And now the Senator from Ohio, before the vote is announced, rises and asks to have his name called. The Senator from Illinois insists that the vote shall be announced.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it is now in order, I desire to vote, and there are two or three others who desire to vote.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the Clerk call the names of those whose names are not recorded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The names will be called through, and the vote announced if that is the sense of the Senate, but the question is who is entitled to be called? That is the way the difficulty arose. If there is no objection the roll will be called through on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

Mr. CONNESS. No matter whether there is objection or not, the question of order is made, and I hope the Chair will direct the roll to be called.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not necessary to call the roll.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all; only the names of those who have not voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called of those Senators who have not answered to their names on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The absentees were called, and Messrs. CORBETT, MORGAN, ROSS, SHERMAN, and WILLIAMS voted in the affirmative, and Messrs. McDONALD and OSBORNE in the negative.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I insist upon my point of order, that the votes of the Senators named in this resolution cannot be taken or reported. I make it at the earliest moment when their votes are read by our Clerk.

Mr. POMEROY. I believe I voted under a misapprehension; I intended to vote yeas.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Williams, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Harris, McDonald, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Stewart, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, and Yates—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Howard, Kellogg, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Tipton, Vickers, Whyte, and Willey—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now I make my point of order that the votes of the Senators interested in this resolution should not be counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question the Chair will submit to the Senate. Of course the Chair cannot undertake to say that a member whose name is on the roll has not a right to vote.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STEWART and Mr. SHERMAN. Let the resolution be adopted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I insist upon this question being determined. We are now coming to the final vote on the resolution, and this is the proper time to raise the question and have it decided. In the Stockton debate the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] presented the law very clearly. He collected the body of authority bearing on this subject with great ability and diligence, and presented it in such manner that it carried the judgment of the Senate against what I thought was its first impression. Although that case was in some respects distinguishable from the present, it was for all the purposes of this point of order a much weaker one. Here is a direct pecuniary interest, whereas in that case there was involved the question of the right of a State to representation and to be heard on this floor. The declaratory rule of parliamentary law as found in the rules of the House of Representatives is as follows:

"No member shall vote on anything in the event of which he has an immediate interest."

And the Senator from Massachusetts very truly and very soundly added these words: "This is an expression in parliamentary language of what I have announced as the principle of universal jurisprudence," applicable, of course, to parliamentary bodies. It is found in Jefferson's Manual, and it is found in all accredited works upon parliamentary law, and in the rules and practices of bodies of this description. It is a fundamental and essential principle extending to all parliamentary action, and extending into courts, and indispensable everywhere where it has application to the ends of justice, to the purity of Government, to the maintenance in its integrity of any form of public administration or public authority.

Following this—I will not trouble the Senate with reading them—are copious citations of authority to show that this question may be raised after the vote even is recorded upon the Journal; and the precedents go so far that they show cases where the decision has been actually reversed upon a subsequent occasion by the rejection of interested votes. This is the undoubted parliamentary law in Great Britain. It was the law incorporated in Mr. Jefferson's Manual, and recognized by the Senate early in the history of our own Government; and this rule which I have read, found in the Manual as applicable to the House of Representatives, is simply declaratory of the general principle. Now, I simply desire a decision of the Senate that the votes of the Senators mentioned in this resolution shall not be put upon the record and shall not be counted.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. President, I am accustomed to meet every question squarely. I will confess that I had a little doubt as to the propriety of my casting a vote on this question, but not the slightest doubt as to my right to do so; for whatever may be general parliamentary law on this subject I have an example in the fact that this Senate have always decided the question of their own pay by their own votes, and that is enough for me.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to lay the question of order on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the question of order be laid on the table. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as it has been amended. The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis;

A bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 328) for the donation of certain columns; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 358) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish cannon to Soldiers' Monument Associations of Pequonock and Paterson, New Jersey.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO.

Mr. HENDRICKS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to appoint a board of engineers of not less than three nor more than five, and instruct them to make a survey of the Ohio river at points where bridges are being constructed or projected, and report to Congress at the next session what length of span is practicable and necessary to meet the requirements of navigation on said river, and of the public interest.

CAPE FEAR RIVER.

Mr. ABBOTT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation for deepening the channel of the Cape Fear river in North Carolina, and to report at the next session by bill or otherwise.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There are a couple of matters that my colleague felt a special interest in. He had to go away, and I feel an interest in having them attended to. I move to take up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Hackleman.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will be debated. Mr. HENDRICKS. Well, let it be debated. Mr. FESSENDEN. It is too late to-night.

Mr. SUMNER. I submit to the Senator from Indiana that we ought to go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to taking up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SUMNER. Pending the motion to take up that bill I submit a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I must call for the yeas and nays on that motion if it is insisted upon.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Williams—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Conkling, Conness, Hendricks, McCreery, McDonald, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Welch, Wilson, and Yates—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Vickers, and Whyte—23.

So the motion was agreed to.

NAVAJO INDIANS.

Mr. WILSON. Before the doors are closed I desire to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia. That committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to aid in relieving from peonage women and children of the Navajo Indians, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and I desire to have it put upon its passage now.

Mr. POMEROY. It ought to be passed right off.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It requests Lieutenant General Sherman to use the most efficient means his judgment will approve to reclaim from peonage women and children of the Navajo Indians, now held in slavery in the Territory adjacent to their homes and the reservation on which the Navajo Indians have been confined.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think that will be a very difficult task for General Sherman. Is he to pay for reclaiming these persons, or to take them by force?

Mr. POMEROY. He is to do the best he can.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after two hours spent therein the doors were reopened.

MRS. BIDWELL AND MRS. HACKLEMAN.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1863) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Emily B. Bidwell, widow of the late Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, at the rate of fifty dollars per month, from the 19th day of October, 1864, on which day General Bidwell fell mortally wounded at the battle of Cedar Creek, Virginia, to continue during widowhood. The pension heretofore allowed her under general law is to be discontinued; but the sum received by her under the same is to be deducted from the pension hereby granted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend that bill by adding the following:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah Hackleman, widow of the late Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman, for pension, at the rate of fifty dollars per month from the 3d day of October, 1862, on which day General Hackleman fell mortally wounded at the battle of Corinth, to continue during her widowhood.

And be it further enacted, That the pension heretofore allowed said Sarah Hackleman, under general law, be discontinued, but the sum received by her under the same shall be deducted from the pension hereby granted, and this pension shall be subject to the provisions of the general pension law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out the time fixed for the commencement of the pensions, and inserting this proviso:

Provided, That the increase of pensions herein granted shall take effect from the date of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to; and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as thus amended, was concurred in. The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended by adding the words "and granting an increase of pension to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman."

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1261) amendatory of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary as a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. COLE. It seems to me this bill needs some explanation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The bill was under discussion last night, and the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] was opposed to it, and so were other Senators.

Mr. CONKLING. On the contrary, if the Senator will listen he will find that he is quite mistaken.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The bill was introduced just for this purpose: in the States recently in rebellion they will not permit any defense whatever to be made in any of the suits which are brought against the express companies of the country. This bill provides that where a defense arises from the fact of the country being in a state of war, not that that shall be a defense, but that in that case the suit may be transferred to the Federal courts under the provision of the Constitution which says that the United States courts may have jurisdiction over questions arising under the laws and treaties of the country.

Mr. STEWART. The report was unanimous on that section. We struck out most of the House bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to ask one question of the Senator from New Jersey, whether the Committee on the Judiciary are unanimous upon this bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No, sir; they are not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not think it ought to be passed. I think it should be laid aside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not had any opportunity to examine this bill. If this is the same bill that was up the other day, when the Senator from Illinois explained it, it appears to me very objectionable in its provisions.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is the same bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Oregon will give way I will move that the doors be closed, and that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator will not make a motion of that sort after the remark he has just made, but will allow me to make one remark. There was a bill which Judge TRUMBULL commented upon containing several sections. That is not this bill at all. This is one single section reported by the committee as a substitute for that bill, and its whole purpose I can state in a moment. In the State of Georgia, for example, there were many letters before us showing that common carriers were sued for goods which had been snatched from them by embodied military power, and certain judges down there have refused to rule upon the question whether that was the act of a public enemy or not, but insisted upon submitting the question to the jury as a pure question of fact under the instruction that all they could find was upon a question of damages, that the common carriers were liable any way even if the goods had been taken from them by a public enemy. This section provides that where they wish to raise that question and carry it up to the Supreme Court of the United States, they shall have an opportunity to transfer their causes into a court where they can present their exceptions and have them ruled upon as matters of law one way or the other, and put themselves on the high road to the court of dernier resort. I want to know who objects to that?

Mr. COLE. Does the gentleman mean the rebel military power.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly, where the rebels in arms prevented the goods being delivered. For example, a company came and swept away a railroad train, taking all the goods in it. The corporation want to be able to submit the question whether this was a public war, or whether the rebels were public enemies, and they themselves as common carriers exempted from the liability which would otherwise rest upon them. I want to know who can object to a provision of that sort. We had before us many statements from lawyers of respectability belonging to no political party, saying that when they went into court the judge would not rule as a matter of law upon that question, nor submit instructions to the jury, so that they could go up with the case, but that he simply submitted as a question of damages to the jury how much was the value of the goods. I do not care anything about this bill, but I hope it will not be put down by any suspicion being cast upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that I understand this bill as well as the members of the Judiciary Committee; but this seems to be the twin brother of another bill that was passed here not very long ago in the interest of corporations. There seems to be a great sensitiveness on the part of corporations, and an apprehension that they cannot obtain justice in the courts of the States. Now, here is a bill which provides, as I understand it, that where a citizen of a State sues a corporation within that State, that corporation may take the case into a Federal court. I should like to know under what clause of the Constitution this can be done.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator asks me, I shall be very happy to answer him. The provision is that when such a suit as that is brought, and the parties sued wish to set up strictly and rigidly a defense growing up under the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, in the language of the Constitution, they may be permitted to do it. If they wish to show that Abraham Lincoln, under the power vested in him by Congress, made a call for troops; that those troops come out; that military collisions took place; that a public war raged under the authority of Congress, and in that public war those goods were swept away—if they wish to set that up and allege that it was by virtue of the Constitution of the United States and the power inhering in the Congress of the United States, they may be permitted to do it; and the part of the Constitution which defines the judicial power specifies that in so many words as a part of the Federal judicial power.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that is not this bill as I understand it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I appeal to the honorable Senator from Oregon to yield me the floor. This bill will evidently lead to a long discussion. We have the Executive Calendar before us, and I move that the doors be closed that we may go on with executive business. There are the treaties of the Senator from Massachusetts and Indian treaties, and General Sherman and all the men upon the plains are writing that the issue of peace or war with the Indians is depending on those treaties. I move that the doors be closed.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. NYE. Will not the Senators give way for one moment?

Mr. SUMNER. No; we must go into executive session.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall have to ask for a division.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If gentlemen want to break up a quorum, and continue this discussion all night, so as to force an extra session next week, let us know it now.

Mr. CONKLING. We have all waited here alike; we are all equally tired; but we are charged with different business. My friend from New Jersey and I are charged by the Committee on the Judiciary with this bill. Senators must not complain that we want to pass it. The bill is right; it has passed the other House in a much broader form, and there is no reason why we should not take the vote on it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We must go on with the executive business to-night or we shall have an extra session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. I call for a division on that question.

The question being taken, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I suggest that by common consent the motion be withdrawn, and that we pass the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is no quorum.

Mr. CONKLING. The call can be withdrawn by common consent.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make a statement about our business. It seems we are without a quorum. Here are a number of treaties to be acted upon, and I think there is absolute necessity for meeting to-morrow evening.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we ought to have a recess until to-morrow night at seven o'clock, and begin fresh then.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think a number of members have gone off with the understanding that such a recess will be taken. It is absolutely necessary in my judgment.

Mr. STEWART. I think there is a quorum here.

Mr. CONKLING. Why not let this bill be voted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is undoubtedly a quorum present, but there was not a quorum voting.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. By common consent let us go into executive session. We cannot get through the bill which is under discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 16.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

At one o'clock and forty minutes a. m., [Sunday, July 26,] the Senate took a recess till 8 o'clock p. m.

SUNDAY EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., [Sunday, July 26.]

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, a report signed by BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, purporting to be by authority of the managers of impeachment called the select committee, has recently been published by the House of Representatives, which requires a short notice at my hands. I have learned that the six gentlemen on that committee have had nothing to do with it; and even in the absence of such information I know them well enough to acquit them of all responsibility in the premises. It was my intention to criticise this report as its character deserves. I have abandoned that intention. First, I have no appropriate epithets for it; and second, if I had I could not in justice to myself, or to the body of which I am a member, use them.

I waive the impropriety of the House of Representatives instituting an investigation into the character of Senators. I waive the utter injustice of constituting a committee for any purpose whatever composed of only one political party, and especially in an investigation of this character. Such committees never elicit the truth. Their reports are entitled to no more credence than ex parte examinations usually are.

In this case the committee was organized in a moment of intense excitement, and bitter personal and political feeling. Whatever may have been the purpose of its organization, all will now admit that its proceedings were conducted to one single end. Ostensibly it was designed to seek new matter of impeachment against the President. The futility of this purpose having soon manifested itself, those having self-respect withdrew from its proceedings, when the whole project degenerated into a low, petty work of malice and calumny, disgraceful not to the author of the report, but disgraceful to the character of an American Congress.

I forbear to comment upon the manner in which this thing has been conducted. If it had been to elicit truth and not falsehood, I could bear to be silent, for even the casual reader can find nothing in its forty-eight pages of wicked perversion derogatory to me as a man or as a member of this body, unless it be derogatory to have entertained, as I did, on the 12th of May last, the thought of resigning my seat in the Senate.

But this, sir, was a matter between me and my constituents, one entirely outside the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives. I am not now and never expect to be ashamed of anything connected with this purpose of mine. The best of us sometimes hesitate as to what is our duty under a given state of circumstances. Whatever hesitancy I may have had resulted from the deliberation of a few moments in reference to my duty to constituents who were supposed to differ with me upon a question of great political concern, and out of regard for what I was assured was their will. In this disgraceful paper, that well-known hesitancy of mine is seized upon, and every fact connected with it knowingly distorted and perverted to accomplish the base purposes of its author. It is attempted to make me inconsistent with myself. This is done by testimony taken not before the impeachment managers, but before another committee of the House of Representatives. That committee was raised to investigate the conduct of the Missouri members for attempting to influence my vote for conviction.

Before that committee I testified. The House members also testified. This report, in order to place me at disadvantage, draws upon only parts of the testimony of these members, taken in their own defense, and extracts not one word from my testimony which gives a full history of all the correspondence and proceedings between us. The members of the lower House were testifying in their own behalf. They were the only parties in interest. The proceeding was in the nature of a prosecution against them. As to the truth of their evidence I have nothing to say. I have never seen the whole of it. This is not the time nor the place to criticise it. It is a matter between ourselves which we can settle. But, Mr. President, have I not a right to complain that the committee before which my testimony and theirs was taken should entirely suppress its own proceedings and fail to make any report at all, while it has furnished to another committee to be incorporated in its report just enough of the statement against me, including those of the parties implicated, to stamp an apparent inconsistency upon my conduct. Is this the mode by which truth is obtained? Was truth in this case sought for? If so why was not all the evidence furnished and published? And if justice is to be done to me why does not the other committee report? If investigating committees are to be the mere vehicles of calumny and detraction, then this report is a marvelously proper one. If their purpose be to conceal the truth this is an eminent success.

As an evidence of the corrupt purpose in which this report is conceived I refer Senators to page 17, where, with the usual fullness of innuendo and insinuation, is introduced the following note, namely:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The HENDERSON matter all right. Lacey has been to see him with Craig. All right. So says Evans.

Truly,

COOPER.

The author then makes the following remarks:

"This note, taken in connection with the testimony, shows that the HENDERSON matter was made 'all right' by Lacey and Craig having 'seen' HENDERSON, and that it was 'all right'—so says EVARTS, the senior counsel of the President, who is shown thereby to have interested himself in knowing that a Senator had been 'seen' and made 'all right,' and in keeping his client informed of the fact."

It will be observed by the reader of this report that an attempt is made to show that money was subscribed by the friends of the President to procure his acquittal. It will be equally observed by the careful reader that there is not one scintilla of evidence going to show that money was raised for any other purpose than to pay the counsel fees of the President. Whether it be right or wrong for the friends of an impeached officer to employ counsel for his defense I shall not undertake to decide. The laws of all free countries guarantee the right to the meanest criminal to be heard by counsel. If the criminal be too poor to employ, counsel is furnished at the public expense. This is the demand of humanity and of justice. Some will say that the President should have been defended in this case at the public expense, and the day may yet come when the public will pay what individual friends may have left unpaid. On one subject I have an opinion. The opinion is that it is infamous in the extreme that this generosity on the part of the President's friends should be knowingly perverted into a charge of corruption against those who voted for acquittal. The only alleged talk of bribery anywhere to be found in this report is by one "Leggett," shown by his own testimony to be the very incarnation of corruption and rascality, who, in order to line his own pockets, offered to sell the votes of Senator POMEROY and four others, all of whom voted for conviction, for $40,000; and a statement by one General Adams, who is denounced in the report itself as wholly unworthy of belief, that he wanted some money for the same purpose. The object of these two men was evidently to obtain money for themselves. None was given them; and if it had been, the corruption would never have extended beyond themselves.

With this statement I return to the note of Cooper, not for the purpose of repelling the insinuations made in the comments upon it, but for the purpose of showing that the contemptible author of this report knew when he penned it what the Cooper note meant. He insinuates that this note, taken "in connection with the testimony," proves something injurious to me. Why does he not publish the testimony? Cooper, Craig, and Lacey all testified before this committee. I charge that he suppressed their testimony explanatory of the note, and published the note, "not in connection with the testimony," but without the testimony. This, of course, was done with the single purpose of injuring my character. This fact contains within itself both species of lying known to the law—the suppression of truth and the suggestion of falsehood. I cannot conceive what good purpose this conduct can accomplish. If it were a larceny of my property I could attribute it to a well-known infirmity of its author, and suffer the mantle of charity silently to be drawn over it. But it manifests a degree of obliquity and devilish malice indicating total depravity. The implication here is not only against myself, but equally strong against Messrs. EVARTS, LACEY, COOPER, CRAIG, and the President, with no one of whom, up to the date of this note, I had ever had one word of conversation upon the subject of impeachment.

And now, Mr. President, I send to the Chair letters from these several gentlemen, written in answer to notes addressed to them, which I wish to have incorporated in my remarks.

The Chief Clerk read the following letters:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
WASHINGTON, July 13, 1868.

DEAR SIR: In General BUTLER's report from the impeachment committee I find the following note on page 17, to wit:

May 13.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: HENDERSON matter all right. Lacey has been to see him with Craig—all right—so says EVARTS.

Truly,

COOPER.

Will you be so kind as to say to me whether you sent such a note to the President, and if so, what is meant by "the HENDERSON matter," and also by the statement that "Lacey has been to see him with Craig"? &c.

Please state also whether you ever had any conversation with me on the subject of impeachment, or communicated with me directly or indirectly on that subject at any time whatever.

Your friend and obedient servant,
J. B. H.
Hon. EDMUND COOPER, Metropolitan Hotel.

WASHINGTON, July 15, 1868.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 13th July, 1868, is before me, and I hasten to answer it.

I wrote the note alluded to, and mentioned in General BUTLER's report, bearing date May 13, addressed to the President.

On the evening of 12th May it was currently reported in Washington that you intended to resign your position as one of the Senators from Missouri. This intention caused great anxiety with the President and his friends.

On the morning of the 13th May I was informed by Mr. Lacey that you had abandoned the idea, and in using the language contained in the note, "the HENDERSON matter all right," I had reference to nothing else except that you would not resign, and that if you did not, in my opinion you would vote for his acquittal.

When, in the hurry of writing the note, I stated "Lacey has been to see him with Craig," I was in error, as Mr. Lacey informed me during the same interview, but after I had written the note, that he had not seen you in person, but had heard from Mr. Craig what your intentions were.

I never had any conversation with you on the subject of impeachment at any time, nor did I ever communicate with you directly or indirectly on that subject.

Very truly,

EDMUND COOPER.

Hon. J. B. HENDERSON, United States Senate.

WINDSOR, VERMONT, July 16, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of 13th instant, addressed to me in New York, was forwarded to me here, and I take the earliest moment to reply to it, regretting that even this delay should have occurred.

I have not seen General BUTLER's report nor much notice of it in the newspapers, and your letter gives me my first and only knowledge of the "note" to the President, which you have transcribed in your letter.

I do not know who "Lacey" or "Craig" is, and, to my knowledge, have never seen either of them, nor heard of them in any connection whatever. I have no means of knowledge or conjecture what the writer of this note referred to as "the HENDERSON matter," except such as the note itself furnishes to any reader.

During the whole course of the President's trial I never had any intercourse with Mr. Cooper (though personally acquainted with him for some years, and having some early college associations in common with him) except of the most casual occurrence. I never had any interview with him by appointment or prearrangement, nor a conference or consultation under any circumstances, as to any means or influences that should or might be used with you, or anybody else, in reference to the President's trial or its result.

In regard to any intercourse or communication, direct or indirect, between yourself or myself from the day I first came to Washington until now, a very brief statement will dispose of the whole of it. After the trial had been in progress for some time, I had the honor to be introduced to you, upon the floor of the Senate, by some member of that body, and beyond an occasional interchange of ordinary conversation on the floor of the Senate, in which, I am quite sure, other Senators were always participants, I have never had any relations with you whatever, nor has anything ever passed between us by any intermediation, written or personal, on any subject whatever.

I have, I believe, fully met the inquiries of your letter, and I shall be happy at all times to satisfy any further wishes you may have in reference to this subject.

It has occurred to me that the true reading of Mr. Cooper's note may not connect his reference to me as his authority with the special allusion to "the HENDERSON matter," but only with the second "all right," as if to say that the general prospect is, as Mr. EVARTS says, favorable. That I early formed the opinion that the case made against the President did not admit of a judicial conviction, and that a political removal from office would not be accomplished, was known to everybody that took the trouble to ask me, and, doubtless, to Mr. Cooper among the rest.

I am, my dear sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM M. EVARTS.

Hon. J. B. HENDERSON, United States Senate.

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1868.

SIR: In reply to your note of this date, I state that on the morning of the 13th day of May last I was informed that you contemplated resigning your seat in the Senate, and my visit to you on that day was simply to advise you, as a personal friend of many years standing, against resigning; and our conversation was confined to that subject.

I did not then know how you intended to vote on the subject of impeachment, and remarked to you that I did not desire to know that I did not come for that purpose. I also said to you what I had previously said to some others, that believing you would vote conscientiously I would defend the vote in Missouri, without reference to whether you voted for conviction or acquittal.

In my examination before BUTLER's committee I was interrogated as to the visit, but neither asked or permitted to repeat our conversation. For a reply to other matters mentioned in your note I respectfully refer you to a letter I had the honor of addressing to Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM, of Ohio, a few days since.

I am, sir, respectfully,

JAMES CRAIG.

Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON.

METROPOLITAN HOTEL,
WASHINGTON, June 9, 1868.

SIR: After making several applications through friends to General BUTLER for a copy of the report made by him to the House for the special committee of the managers of impeachment, of which you are chairman, I to-day succeeded in procuring a copy, for which I am indebted to the politeness of General LOGAN. In commenting upon this remarkable document, I desire in advance to disclaim any intention of attributing to you its authorship, or any responsibility for its character. An acquaintance of more than twenty-five years gives me authority for saying that you are incapable of either writing or knowingly sanctioning a report made up of deliberate perversions of truth, and of bald, unblushing falsehoods.

I proceed to notice the report so far as it connects me with the impeachment trial, in the full belief that you could not have read either the evidence or the report, and protesting that if it had gone out to the world as the individual production of Manager BUTLER, and not as the joint report of yourself, and some other gentlemen of high character associated with BUTLER upon the committee, I should not have troubled you or the public with this hasty letter.

I have never indulged in the use of those epithets so generally applied to General BUTLER, among the mildest of which are "Brute," "Beast," "Thief," &c., fearing that in the political excitement of the times his enemies were possibly doing him injustice; nor could I until now fully realize the pungency of the language you once applied to him on the floor of the House of Representatives, that "he had been raised in a bottle and fed with a spoon." I can now "see the point," and without investigating the origin or discussing the propriety of the epithets heretofore bestowed upon him, the document now in question conclusively proves him to be "a great liar and a dirty dog."

A note purporting to have been written by Mr. Cooper to the President, stating that "HENDERSON is all right; Lacey has gone to see him with Craig; so says EVARTS," induced your committee to subpoena me. I attended in obedience to the subpoena, fully determined to answer all questions whatever, proper or improper, which might be propounded, and upon my examination, General BUTLER and LOGAN being the only members of the committee present, I did so answer.

In my testimony I admitted that I had visited Senator HENDERSON, but not with Mr. Lacey; that, although on terms of intimate friendship with Senator HENDERSON, I had never felt at liberty to inquire how he intended to vote on the impeachment until the night before the vote was to be taken; and that the Senator having called at my hotel to bid my family farewell, and I being about to start for Missouri, I then asked him, as I would leave the city within a few minutes, to tell me whether he would vote next day for conviction or acquittal; and that when he informed me of his intention to vote for acquittal I was astonished, for I had offered only a few hours before to bet that he would vote for conviction on one or more of the articles. On my way to the omnibus I met Mr. Lacey on the sidewalk, and told him what the Senator had just communicated to me. This was all that occurred between Lacey and me; and to more completely expose the perversion contained in the report, I will add that I never saw Lacey and HENDERSON together in my life; and in addition to this, Mr. Lacey testified before the committee that he had seen Senator HENDERSON but twice in six years, and on neither of those occasions was impeachment mentioned, either directly or indirectly.

On page 17 of the report appears the following: "Was not the information of Leggett on the morning of the 13th quite correct, that unless the Missouri delegation got HENDERSON's promise before twelve o'clock, to resign or vote for conviction, they never would get it, as Craig had gone to see him; and they never did."

I quote the above paragraph to illustrate the character of the report. This Leggett is the man who confessedly presented a forged letter purporting to come from Senator POMEROY, for the purpose of getting $40,000 for the votes of certain Senators to acquit; and yet BUTLER parades his evidence in his report, apparently with the sanction of the committee as worthy of belief.

On page 19 the report states that I dined at Welker's with Woolley, Mr. EVARTS, one of the President's counsel, being also a guest. This is one of the most damnable and willful falsehoods in the report. I have never been in Welker's restaurant, never saw Woolley, do not know him by sight, and I have never been introduced to, nor have I ever spoken to Mr. EVARTS. This was a plain, palpable, intentional misrepresentation by BUTLER, which needs no further comment.

I have before given the substance of my testimony on the subject of my "seeing and securing HENDERSON." I will add that a day or two after giving my testimony I called at the committee-room to correct a mistake I had made in my evidence, which I did by writing a note to the clerk of the committee, with General BUTLER's consent, and in his presence. I then told him that justice to the Senate and to the country would be promoted if he would ask me the main question upon the subject which he was ordered to investigate—that is, whether I had used, or attempted to use, any influence, political, pecuniary, or otherwise, to induce any Senator to vote to acquit the President—and assured him I was ready to swear that I had not done so, either directly or indirectly. BUTLER refused to ask the question.

The report states that Lacey's testimony disagrees with mine; that Lacey communicated to Lacey HENDERSON's intention to vote against conviction on Friday evening, and that Lacey states it was on Saturday evening, when, according to my statement, I was far on my way to Missouri. By reference to the testimony of Lacey, (question 103, page 16,) you will see that no such discrepancy appears, and BUTLER knew his assertion was false when he wrote it.

On the same page the report says I am president of certain railroads in Missouri in which Mr. HENDERSON is interested. I do not think Mr. HENDERSON owns any railroad stock anywhere, and I know he does not have a farthing of interest in any road or company in Missouri or elsewhere with which I am connected, and no witness before the committee testified that he had any such interest.

Such are a few of the more glaring falsehoods contained in the report. It is unnecessary to specify others. These are sufficient to brand the production with a portion of the infamy pertaining to its author.

To briefly sum up the facts, I will state that I remained in Washington attending to the business of the several railroad companies with which I am connected during the whole time of the impeachment trial, and did not once allude to the subject of impeachment, either in conversation or in writing, to any Senator except to Senator HENDERSON, and I did not try to ascertain his intentions until after the evidence and arguments had been closed, and I was about to leave the city, on the night before the vote was taken; and, although superfluous, I make the assertion, that no man acquainted with the character of Senator HENDERSON, would have ventured to make any improper or corrupt overtures to him on that or any other subject.

I was a member of the Democratic convention of 1860, at Charleston, South Carolina, where BUTLER voted fifty odd times for Jeff. Davis for candidate for the Presidency. Differing with BUTLER as to the fitness of his candidate, I made certain remarks which I suppose he considered offensive, and it seems he has neither forgotten nor forgiven me. After several southern States had, under the advice of BUTLER, withdrawn from the convention, BUTLER attended the "bolters' meeting," and made a speech, in which he promised his fire-eating brethren (in the event of a war resulting from the rupture) the use of half a million northern Democrats to slay the northern abolitionists before they should invade a southern State.

I was disposed at the time to doubt BUTLER's sincerity, but subsequent events have satisfied me that he would have tried to fulfill his promise if he had continued to believe that the paying side; but after reflecting upon the numerical strength of the northern States, and especially upon the strength of northern States, he concluded that jewelry and plate were more accessible at the South, and hence took the side of his country, and busied himself during the war in taking jewelry, plate, and other things, instead of taking Fort Fisher, Big Bethel, and other places.

You will not doubt my sincerity when I suggest that you cannot afford to place your hard-earned and well-deserved character in the keeping of this miserable parody on his species. When he charged you with contributing to the murder of an innocent woman, nobody believed him, and the American people read the terrible charge in the Globe with a shudder of indignation; but if you permit him to act as chairman of your committee, bully and badger witnesses, falsify records, manufacture evidence, and finally make a report in the names of your committee that would shock the sensibilities of a buccaneer, even your character, heretofore without stain, may be injured.

The only truth I find in the report, so far as it relates to me, is, that I was once a member of Congress, and now collector of internal revenue for my district. I voluntarily left my seat in Congress, and will within a week resign the collectorship. For the manner in which I discharged my duties in Congress I refer you to my constituents; and for the kind of "whisky ring" I belong to, I refer you to the files of the revenue department in this city, and to Hon. E. A. Rollins, the Commissioner.

I am, sir, with high regard, your old friend,
JAMES CRAIG.

Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM.

METROPOLITAN HOTEL,
WASHINGTON, June 15, 1868.

SIR: In answer to your note of to-day I can only repeat what I stated as a witness before the impeachment managers on the 18th ultimo, that I had not mentioned the subject of the impeachment of the President to you or any other Senator until after his trial and acquittal: that I had visited you but twice during this session of Congress, once about the 17th of February, before impeachment was inaugurated, and once early in April. My first visit was to inform you I had been asked to accept the office of collector of internal revenue at New Orleans, and to learn if you would give me your influence to secure my confirmation if I got the nomination; you said as then advised you would, but advised me to get letters of indorsement to other Senators, as you had known nothing of me since I left Missouri. I promised to do so and retired, leaving in your room Mr. Britton and Mr. Lumberger, of St. Louis, who were present during the interview. I left for Memphis soon after, and returned here the last of March, and called upon you early in April, and exhibited my letters of indorsement, which were satisfactory, and you promised to favor my confirmation. These two interviews are all we have had for several years. I have met you occasionally on the avenue and in the corridors of the Capitol at times subsequent to that date, but nothing occurred beyond a bow of recognition. And now I repeat that at no time between the inception of the impeachment and the vote on the eleventh article did I ever mention to you or to me the subject of impeachment. I was not here for any such purpose, but had been summoned here to take an office which I had not sought.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. T. LACEY.
Hon. J. B. HENDERSON, E Street, Washington.

Mr. HENDERSON. I stated that the author was advised of the meaning of this note when he prepared the report.

On page 16 of the report a part of the testimony of Mr. Lacey is introduced for another purpose, and it will be seen by his testimony that Mr. Craig having heard that I was going to resign called on me on the 13th of May to advise me against it. I quote from the questions and answers of Mr. Lacey:

"Question. Was it the day you told the fact to Mr. Cooper?"

"Answer. Yes."

"Question. Craig did go to see HENDERSON?"

"Answer. He told me he did that night or the next day. I got the information from Silas Woodson. When I returned from the post office I met Silas Woodson from Missouri, and he said HENDERSON is going to 'stick.' 'He is not going to resign.'"

Instead, therefore, of the testimony leaving the true meaning of this note in obscurity, it explains it in such manner as to strip the insinuations of all plausibility, and to stamp the author as a bold, willful, and intentional falsifier of the truth. I must refer to one other statement contained in this document intended to affect me injuriously. On page 18 appears the following telegram:

WASHINGTON, May 15, 1868.

Senator HENDERSON says conviction will fail by two votes.
LOCKWOOD.

JOHN R. GARLAND, New York.

Then follows the insinuation, "so the gold-room had the benefit of Senator HENDERSON's knowledge." At another place we are told that "Lockwood" is Mr. L. L. Crouse, the intelligent and gentlemanly Washington correspondent of the New York Times. On the same page is given the testimony of Colonel McCLEUNG, a member of Congress from Missouri, taken, not before this committee, but extracted, as I have said, from the unpublished records of another committee, in which testimony appears the following passage, namely:

"Senator HENDERSON handed to me in writing his reply to the delegation, (this was the evening of the 14th of May.) He then stated to me in most distinct and positive language that the impeachment of the President would fail; that the second article would fail by either 'at least' or 'about' two votes. (I will not say which.) and the eleventh article would fail by three or four votes."

"Upon my asking if I might repeat this conversation to my colleagues, and being answered in the affirmative, I retired."

I now send to the desk the letter of Mr. Crouse, with whom I had not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance until since the publication of this report.

The Chief Clerk read the following letter:

DEAR SIR: Your note of the 20th instant is received. In reply I have to say that the dispatch in question was not founded on any conversation had with you, and further, that I never had any communication with you, directly or indirectly, on the subject of impeachment. The information on which I based this and other dispatches, public and private, came to me in such a positive manner from members of the Missouri delegation, that I felt warranted in putting it in such brief and positive terms. But the assumption of BUTLER that "HENDERSON told Crouse" what is contained in this dispatch, or anything else, is wholly unwarranted, either by the dispatch itself or any other evidence in or out of BUTLER's possession, and, I may add, is only another evidence of those skillful perversions of the truth for which that gentleman has achieved a reputation which none can desire or hope to approach.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
L. L. CROUSE.

Hon. J. B. HENDERSON.

Mr. HENDERSON. It therefore appears, Mr. President, first, that I did not communicate the information to Mr. Crouse for any purpose whatever; second, that it was communicated only as an opinion to Colonel McCLEUNG, an active friend of impeachment, with the privilege that he might communicate it to the other Missouri members, who were equally favorable to impeachment; third, that this information, for good or bad purposes, was communicated by them to Mr. Crouse, and not by me; and fourth, that the insinuation contained in this report against me is gratuitous and false, and the writer knew it.

Mr. President, one or two general remarks and I am done. I forbear to characterize this whole proceeding as history must receive it. For selfish and malicious purposes the whole power of this Government has been given for fifty days. Telegraph offices have been ransacked and the operators dragged before a secret committee and subjected to a species of examination unknown in this country. Private letters have been surreptitiously taken from the desks of the writers. The officers of banks have been compelled to expose the accounts of their customers, and to their utter astonishment have been interrogated as to the corruption of men whose characters were previously without stain. Men have been subjected to imprisonment and insult such as illustrated the days of the base, contemptible, and cowardly Jeffreys.

After all this work of iniquity a cunning, perverted statement is made suppressing and concealing the entire mass of testimony taken, which statement contains nothing except such miserable assaults as I have referred to. The logic of the document is as vicious and corrupt as the motives prompting the proceeding. The object of the entire proceeding was to injure those who could not be bullied nor seduced into an abandonment of their convictions of right to selfish or partisan purposes. It was to bring suspicion on the seven Republican Senators who voted for acquittal. The President is lost sight of. The report is simply a work of vengeance. It is not to vindicate truth. It is the punishment which malice inflicts to soothe its disappointment. The impotency of the effort is acknowledged in a passage of that corrupt logic to which I have referred, found on page 33. It reads as follows:

"While Adams and men of his stamp, as is admitted so freely, are offering the votes of other Senators in the market, as almost to establish a price-current for them, yet no man, upon the evidence before your committee, breathes the thought that any one of the seven was open to the slightest suspicion of approach."

The report proceeds:

"Does not this studied silence of all the witnesses as to the 'seven' appear as the conscious attempted concealment of all clew to their motives lest they should be discovered?"

We are told in this connection that the names of Senators NYE, TIFTON, POMEROY, WILSON, THAYER, ANTHONY, SPRAGUE, and MORTON are canvassed as proper subjects for bribery and corruption, but no one breathes the name of the seven. Then comes the conclusion that the seven must be guilty because there is no testimony against them, and the others must be innocent because there is testimony against them. How much these gentlemen must feel indebted to the writer for his kindness in connecting their names with these disgraceful proceedings, suppressing the testimony, and then volunteering his own hypocritical defense that they are "honorable" men! I know they are honorable men. The country knows it. But their characters are none the better for being vouched by the author of this paper. They need no defense from BENJAMIN F. BUTLER. When the necessity for defense shall arise thousands of honest and patriotic men throughout the land will spring forward to attest their integrity and purity, even against the false implications of his vicious logic. After this last argument, that the absence of all proof to support a fact is the best evidence to establish it I dismiss the report, the infamous proceedings which led to its publication, and its more infamous author, to that just contempt which they have already received at the hands of honest and reflecting men of all political parties and of all shades of opinion.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the credentials of Hon. Willard Warner, elected a Senator by the Legislature of Alabama for the term ending March 3, 1871; which were read.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator-elect is now present and ready to take the oaths prescribed by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore administered the oaths prescribed by law to Mr. WARREN, and he took his seat in the Senate.

THE FUNDING BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, having met, after free and full conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows: That the House recede from their sixth, eighth, ninth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the tenth and twelfth amendments of the House, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the House, so far as it proposes to strike out words, and agree to the said amendment with an amendment as follows: insert in lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out the words "as he may prescribe, and of denominations of $100, or any multiple of that sum," and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the House so far as it proposes to strike out words, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: insert in lieu of the words stricken out "thirty and forty years respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say: the issue of bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent.," and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the House so far as it proposes to strike out words, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: insert in lieu of the words stricken out "and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States other than such income tax as may be assessed on other incomes, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority," and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment of the House, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: page 1, line twenty-five (of the bill) after the word "used" insert the words "par for par."

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the fifth amendment of the House, and agree to the same with the following amendments:

Page 1, line twenty-eight (of the bill) strike out the words "present interest-bearing debt," and insert in lieu thereof the words "present outstanding bonds."

Page 1, line thirty, strike out the words "the three per cent. certificates," and insert in lieu thereof the words "known as the five-twenty bonds."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the seventh amendment of the House, and agree to the same with the following amendment: page 2, lines thirty-three and thirty-four, strike out the words "outstanding or existing obligations as limited herein," and insert in lieu thereof the words "such five-twenty bonds," and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the eleventh amendment of the House, and agree to the same, with amendments, as follows: insert in said House amendment, after the word "negotiation," the word "redemption"; page 3, line fourteen, strike out the word "or," and after the word "negotiation" insert the words "redemption or exchange;" and the House agree to the same.

They further recommend that the title be amended so that it will read:

"An act providing for the payment of the national debt, and for the reduction of the rate of interest thereon."

JOHN SHERMAN,
E. D. MORGAN,
GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is what is commonly called the funding bill. Senators will remember that as it passed the Senate it contained four sections. The first prescribed the classes of bonds; one at twenty years at five per cent.; one at thirty years at four and a half per cent.; and one at forty years at four per cent., in which the debt of the United States was to be converted. The second section provided for a sinking fund of $135,000,000. The third section legalized gold contracts.

The fourth section prohibited the payment of percentages or commissions on the exchange of bonds. The House of Representatives added several new sections. They struck out the section in regard to gold contracts, and changed the first section so as to provide for the issue of bonds running forty years, at an interest of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. This disagreement came before the committee of conference extending to nearly all parts of the bill. The result of the conference has been that we report a bill of three sections, providing for the second and third classes of the bonds prescribed in the Senate bill, omitting the first class; so that the bill provides for bonds running for thirty years at four and a half per cent., and forty years at four per cent., principal and interest payable in gold, and of precisely the legal character stipulated in the Senate bill, free from all tax except the income tax levied upon other incomes in the United States.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Are they redeemable before maturity?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are not redeemable until after maturity, payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty and forty years.

The second section, providing for the sinking fund, is left as it passed both Houses, the amendments of the House being verbal in character.

The third section provided for gold contracts. The House disagreed to that, and the Senate conferees, with great reluctance, finally yielded that section.

The fourth section is substantially as it passed in the Senate, simply adding the word "redemption" after the word "negotiation." The House recede from all the other sections that they added to the bill. There were four of them, I believe, making new provisions in regard to the public debt. If Senators wish any further information about it I have the bill as it will stand according to the report of the committee, and as the matter is of great importance, I will ask the Clerk to read the bill, as it is short, as it will stand if the report is adopted.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

An act providing for the payment of the national debt, and for the reduction of the rate of interest thereon.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of $100, or any multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after thirty and forty years, respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say: the issue of bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent.; which said bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States other than such income tax as may be assessed on other incomes, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the said bonds shall be exclusively used, par for par, for the redemption of or in exchange for an equal amount of any of the present outstanding bonds of the United States known as the five-twenty bonds, and may be issued to an amount, in the aggregate, sufficient to cover the principal of all such five-twenty bonds, and no more.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there is hereby appropriated out of the duties derived from imported goods the sum of $135,000,000 annually, which sum, during each fiscal year, shall be applied to the payment of the interest and to the reduction of the principal of the public debt, in such a manner as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury or as Congress may hereafter direct; and such reduction shall be in lieu of the sinking fund contemplated by the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind shall be allowed to any person for the sale, negotiation, redemption, or exchange of any bonds or securities of the United States, or of any coin or bullion disposed of at the Treasury Department or elsewhere on account of the United States; and all acts and parts of acts authorizing or permitting, by construction or otherwise, the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint any agent, other than some proper officer of his Department, to make such sale, negotiation, redemption, or exchange of bonds and securities, are hereby repealed.

Mr. CORBETT. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio. I notice that the committee have stricken out the words "at the option of the holder." I desire to inquire whether or not the Secretary has a right to compel the present holders to receive these bonds in exchange for the five-twenty bonds that have matured, the five years having expired?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that simply in the negative. There is no such power in the bill or anywhere else. We do not make these bonds legal tenders in the payment of debts. The exchange must be voluntary.

Mr. CORBETT. "Par for par," as I understand it, and it seemed to me there might be such a thing as exchanging them not at the option of the holders, but compelling them to take them. It is very difficult to judge of the precise character of the bill from hearing it read in this way. I should like to have it printed. It is a very important matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that no change has been made in the legal effect of the section referred to as it stood in the Senate, and as it was agreed to in the House. The House have inserted some words and stricken out others. It is to be a voluntary exchange par for par between the present bonds and the new bonds.

Mr. CORBETT. To test the sense of the Senate, I move that the bill be printed as proposed to be amended by the conference committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate can do as they please about that. As a matter of course that would defeat the bill, because the House of Representatives meet at nine o'clock in the morning, and we shall have no time to get the bill and report printed. The Senator, with his known sagacity and shrewdness, I have no doubt can see exactly the provisions of the bill without having it printed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I do not understand how much of the existing public debt may be put into the bonds proposed in this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The five-twenties; none others. About sixteen hundred millions will be the aggregate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then it is substantially as now presented by the committee, a bill to change the five-twenties into four and a half and four per cent. thirty and forty year bonds, free from all forms of taxation.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I notice that the last section of the bill prohibits any compensation being allowed for the transaction of this business by any outside agent of the Government; but there was in the old conversion a fruitful source of income in permitting the bonds of the Government to lie on deposit in the hands of the agent. This is not remedied. I am not willing to let the matter pass without the Senate understanding that if the old practice is carried out of the Treasury Department, permitting these bonds to remain out on deposit prior to their being sold, one half per cent. or one per cent. could very easily be made by the parties negotiating them.

The report was concurred in.

INDEXING THE TAX BILL.

Mr. HOWE. I move to take up House bill No 1457.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1457) to pay for indexing the tax bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay out of the contingent fund of the House $100 to the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means for indexing the act of July 20, 1868.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLERK OF HOUSE—SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to take up House joint resolution No. 325. It is the last measure from the Committee on Appropriations that I have to present. It will not occupy a minute.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 325) relative to the pay of the chief clerk in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Clerk of the House to pay from the contingent fund of the House to the chief clerk in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms the difference between his present pay and the amount voted him by resolution of the House, passed June 25, 1866, thereby fixing the salary of the chief clerk in the office of Sergeant-at-Arms at $2,500 per annum.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITIA IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill respecting the organization of the militia in the States lately in rebellion, and I desire to put it on its passage.

Mr. HARLAN. I understood that this session was agreed on for a special purpose, and I should only reconcile the propriety of this session of the Senate on account of the character of the business that was expected to come before the Senate. I move, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON. I wish the Senator would allow us to get this bill through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put there were, on a division—yeas 13, nays 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Henderson, McCree, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Tipton, Van Winkle, and Wilcox—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Ferry, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Osborn, Rice, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Welch, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frothingham, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Salisbury, Spencer, Trumbull, Vickers, Warner, and Whyte—21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the bill which I have reported will now be put on its passage.

The bill (S. No. 648) respecting the organization of the militia in the States lately in rebellion was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to repeal so much of the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1867, as prohibits the organization, arming, or calling into service of the militia forces in the States lately in rebellion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe that bill has been reported to-night. If so, I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made the bill cannot be considered further.

HISTORY OF THE MONITOR.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 24th instant, information in relation to the construction of the iron-clad monitor, be laid upon the table and printed, and that five hundred extra copies be printed for the use of the Navy Department.

ERROR IN TAX BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 1455) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes, report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I desire to have it considered at this time.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the last clause of the first sentence of section forty-eighth of the act of July 20, 1868, by inserting the word "not" after the word "containing."

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to offer a resolution.

Mr. DRAKE. No, sir; I think we have gone far enough to-night in this kind of business. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. The Senate remained in executive session till one o'clock and forty-five minutes a. m., (Monday, July 27,) when it adjourned to meet at half past nine a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 25, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock in. The reading of the Journal of yesterday was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

PORTAGE LAKE SHIP-CANAL.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business pending at the expiration of yesterday's session, being the bill (S. No. 398) extending the Portage Lake and Lake Superior ship-canal to Keeweenaw bay, providing for the right of way, and making a grant of land to aid in the continuance of said extension. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DRIGGS. I desire to say that one of the amendments which the Committee on the Public Lands have instructed me to offer provides that this company shall not charge any greater toll upon the canal when finished than may be necessary to keep the canal in running order. Some gentlemen have an impression that this company has already received a grant of land for this canal. That is a mistake. This is an entirely distinct work from that for which a grant was made a few years since. I will now present the amendment to which I have alluded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following: Provided, That the lands herein granted shall not be withdrawn upon entry or settlement except upon lists of actual selection and the payment of fees allowed by law at the local land office: And provided further, All arable lands selected under this grant shall remain subject to preemption settlement at the minimum price of $2 50 per acre until the completion of said canal and so long as they shall remain the property of said company: And provided further, That after the cost of said canal and break-water shall be reimbursed to said company by the sale of said lands, or otherwise, it shall not be lawful for said company to charge or receive any higher rates of toll than shall be sufficient to pay the expense of running the canal and keeping the works in repair.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

INCREASED DUTIES ON IMPORTED COPPER.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report a joint resolution (H. R. No. 359) providing for increased duties on imported copper and copper ore.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that from and after the passage of this act in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the articles herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following specified duties and rates of duty, that is to say: on all copper imported in the form of ores, three cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all regulus of copper, and on all black or coarse copper, four cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all old copper, fit only for remanufacture, four cents per pound; on all copper in plates, bars, ingots, pigs, and in other forms not manufactured or herein enumerated, five cents per pound.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Has the joint resolution been received?

The SPEAKER. It was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. KERR. I rise to a question of order. Should this not under the rules go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means can report at any time; but the gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that this is a tariff bill, imposing a tax upon the people, and must receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair is compelled under the rules to sustain that point of order. It must, therefore, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

It was so referred.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, after the pending bill is disposed of the business on the Speaker's table will be resumed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

AMERICAN LINE OF OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. HILL. I submit the following report from a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 939) entitled "An act to provide for an American line of mail and passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports," have had the same under consideration, and agree to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second and third amendments of the Senate.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first, fourth, and fifth amendments, to wit:

In line twelve, page 1 of engrossed bill, strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen."

In line fourteen, page 3 of engrossed bill, strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen."

In line twenty-six, page 5 of engrossed bill, strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen."

JOHN HILL,

J. F. FARNSWORTH,

FERNANDO WOOD,

Managers on the part of the House.

ALEXANDER RAMSEY,

J. W. PATTERSON,

ALEXANDER G. CATTELL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HILL demanded the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORTAGE LAKE AND LAKE SUPERIOR CANAL.

Mr. DRIGGS. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ECKLEY.]

Mr. ECKLEY. The Committee on the Public Lands had two sessions at least for the consideration of this bill, and I believe they were all, with the exception of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TABER], in favor of it, after full investigation and deliberate consideration. The bill explains itself, and I think with the further explanation of the gentleman from Michigan the House understands it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. DRIGGS. I will.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman from Michigan has stated correctly that this bill, or a certified copy of it, has been considered informally by the Committee on the Public Lands, and I believe the committee generally acquiesced in it, and allowed it to be reported to the House. But I am satisfied for one, from facts which I have learned since the action of the committee on the bill, that it ought not to pass. Unless, therefore, I shall be better satisfied that the bill ought to pass I shall vote against it. I have learned that it interferes with private rights. There is a canal already nearly completed, and one of the gentlemen interested in it has told me that he has laid out his money and his friends have done the same, and they have never asked any aid from the Government for the work, and they do not want Congress to grant land to another corporation to their detriment. It strikes me this is an outrage upon these parties who have built the canal from their own private means, and I trust, without further investigation, the House will not pass this bill. I am reminded that this same company has already had a grant of four hundred thousand acres of land, but my friend from Michigan assures me it is for another purpose.

Now, sir, I desire to be entirely fair. I would like to have this bill referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and if I am mistaken in my statement I will certainly favor the passage of this bill at the next session of Congress. But from my present information I think it ought not to pass.

Mr. DRIGGS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the House that last evening when the gentleman from Wisconsin had a bill before the House, in which I felt a very deep interest and to which the Committee on the Public Lands had agreed to allow me the privilege of offering an amendment when it was presented, I could not get the gentleman to yield to me to offer that amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not wish to contradict my friend, but if he will show any such record of the Committee on the Public Lands I will not, of course, dispute what he says.

Mr. DRIGGS. Gentlemen present will bear me out.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have asked the clerk of the committee this morning, and I am informed that there is no such record of the action of the committee on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Discussion as to what was agreed upon in a committee is not in order.

Mr. DRIGGS. I have treated the gentleman fairly and allowed him to offer his objections to this bill. Now one word in regard to this canal. It was built at a cost of about seventy thousand dollars, and I am informed that the company has received back already in tolls almost the whole amount expended. The rates of toll charged are enormous. Now, this bill provides that before this company can receive one foot of land they must pay back every dollar that the canal company have expended, the amount to be ascertained by a commission appointed by the Secretary of War. And let me say further that this company propose to charge one fourth the rate of toll upon the shipping that the canal company are now charging.

The gentleman from Wisconsin has alluded to gentlemen who he says will be greatly aggrieved if this bill passes. Now, sir, I state what I know when I declare that one of those gentlemen proposed to these other parties to take $100,000 and withdraw his objection to this bill. That, sir, was nothing more nor less than an attempt at black-mail upon the present company, who propose to build a good canal for the passage of vessels through Portage lake.

I will say further, that you have given three or four hundred thousand acres of land to build a canal from the west end of the lake to Lake Superior, and that that grant will be rendered entirely useless if another company charging enormous tolls have possession of the east end. I have petitions from nearly all the people living there—the shippers and shipowners—asking this grant, and the committee have unanimously agreed upon it. I call the previous question.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I hope not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, no; let us discuss this measure.

Mr. COBURN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. DRIGGS. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. COBURN. The gentleman from Michigan has said that this is no interference with the rights of third persons. I desire to state to the House the condition of this Portage Lake canal, so far as I know, and in order to do that I shall have to describe the location. Keewenaw point is a tongue of land that juts out into Lake Superior some fifteen or more miles wide. Portage lake lies partly across that point. From the south side of the point into Portage lake there is a small stream which is not navigable. There are certain copper mines upon the banks of Portage lake. In order to open those mines to navigation the owners opened a canal to the south at an expense of about eighty thousand dollars, and they have in their possession a fee simple right to the lands through which this canal runs, along the banks of Portage river. In other words, the citizens of Hancock and Houghton own the canal running south into Lake Superior.

Now, two or three years ago a grant was made of two hundred thousand acres of land for the construction of a canal from the north end of Portage lake into Lake Superior, so that there would be a channel clear across from one side of Keewenaw point to the other. They received this large grant of two hundred thousand acres of land for the construction of a canal one mile and six hundred feet long from the north end of Portage lake to Lake Superior. They come now and ask two hundred thousand acres of land more for the construction of that work, and they not only want that, but the right and title to, and absolute control of this little canal made at the south end, which was made by private enterprise, and is the property in fee simple, and by every right known to man, of the citizens of Hancock and Houghton.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman makes an unintentional misstatement in regard to the length of the canal. It is two miles and three tenths of a mile in length.

Mr. COBURN. It is one mile and six hundred feet long, as I am reliably informed. I have been on the ground. They have no right to take a canal made at an expense of nearly one hundred thousand dollars and the property of private citizens. I pronounce it now a fraud. I say that they have no more right to take this land and Congress has no more right to legislate it away than they have to take the title to any square in Washington city. These men bought the lands from the Government and have spent their money to make the canal. They have two towns with from three to five thousand inhabitants each, and the best copper mines of Lake Superior, worth vast sums of money, and all in consequence of their own independence and enterprise in opening this canal into Lake Superior. And these men, this new company, now seek, and this bill undertakes to take it away from men who spent this money freely and honestly without asking the Government for a cent. On the other hand, the men who ask this large additional bonus have been two years in making about eight hundred feet of canal. With two hundred thousand acres of land in their possession they could have made that canal last year, but they have made only about eight hundred feet, and I do not believe they intend to make the canal at all unless they get another large bonus. They deserve neither the additional land nor the vested rights of the citizens there in the improvements on Portage river.

Mr. DRIGGS. I have but a word to say. I seem to come in conflict with the gentleman in regard to facts and figures, and I am unable now, of course, to prove what I assert, that this canal is two miles and three tenths of a mile in length, and that it is about half completed instead of only eight hundred feet. The gentleman from Indiana doubtless states what he believes to be correct, but I am very confident that it is incorrect.

Now, as I have called out so much discussion on this subject, and as I do not want anything that is not fair and right and just, I will move that the bill and pending amendment be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 579) to establish a new land district in the State of Nebraska; when the Speaker signed the same.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill in reference to paying a percentage for the sale of bonds, and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to give a monthly statement of the indebtedness under the different enumerations of bonds, currency, gold, &c. The substance of this bill was before the House some time ago, and some provisions of it were in fact inserted in the funding bill on my motion. But for fear that that bill may not become a law I ask that this bill may be now considered.

No objection was made, and the bill (H. R. No. 1454) making certain regulations as to the public debt was received, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. The first section provides that from and after the passage of this act no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind shall be allowed to any person for the sale, or negotiation, or exchange of any bonds or securities of the United States disposed of at the Treasury Department or elsewhere on account of the United States, or for any coin or bullion; and all acts and parts of acts authorizing or permitting, by construction or otherwise, the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint any agent other than some officer of his Department to make such sale or negotiation of bonds and securities are hereby repealed. The second section provides that on and after the passage of this act all authority under any existing law to issue bonds, or interest-bearing Treasury notes, or obligations of the United States shall cease and determine; provided that nothing herein shall prevent the conversion of Treasury notes known as "seven-thirties" into five-twenty bonds, nor the issue of the three per cent. certificates of temporary loan, nor the exchanging of registered bonds for coupon bonds, nor the issue of bonds as subsidies to railroad companies as provided by law. The third section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall publish monthly a detailed statement of the public debt at the close of each month, in which statement all the bonds and other obligations of the United States issued from the Treasury Department payable after the year in which such statement is made, including the amount of seven-thirty Treasury notes convertible into five-twenty bonds, and not including subsidy bonds issued to railroad companies, shall be classed as the funded debt; the United States and fractional notes issued for circulation as money shall be classed as the currency debt; the three per cent. certificates of temporary loan shall be classed as the temporary loan debt; and all debt that is past due, or that will be payable within the year, the same to be stated in detail, shall be classed as the matured debt, and all interest shall cease on such matured debt when it becomes due, but the same shall be paid on presentation at the Treasury. Such statement shall also contain an account of the amount outstanding of subsidy bonds issued to railroad companies; also the amount of coin, the amount of outstanding gold certificates, and the whole amount of currency in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to make a suggestion in regard to one of the sections of this bill, and also to move an amendment to it. The suggestion I have to make is in regard to the last section of the bill, I think. It is that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be required to report the amount of interest due and unpaid, for it happens now that we think we are diminishing our debt, and on the 1st of July or the 1st of January, when a large amount of interest becomes due and is paid, we find that we are losing instead of gaining. I also ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to allow me to offer an amendment as an additional section.

Mr. LOGAN. I will yield to allow the amendment to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, prohibited from making sales of gold for any purpose whatever.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that amendment, and I allow it to be offered. I think there can be no objection to the provisions of this bill, as similar provisions were incorporated in the funding bill, already passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF MAJOR JOHN RIPLEY.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812 was discharged from further consideration of the petition of the heirs of Major John Ripley, and it was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

G. P. PUTNAM AND ELIZA KETCHAM.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 360) relative to the accounts of George P. Putnam and Eliza Ketcham; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PRINTING OF LAND OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House fifteen thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1867, five thousand of the above in full with the connected maps of the United States, and ten thousand of the abridgments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like the gentleman to explain this resolution.

Mr. LAFLIN. The document we propose to print is the regular report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. We propose to publish fifteen thousand extra copies, five thousand with the connected maps and ten thousand in the abridged form.

The resolution was adopted.

REPORT ON EDUCATION.

Mr. LAFLIN also, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the House of Representatives did, upon the 2d of June last, order the printing of the report of the Commissioner of Education, with the accompanying documents; and whereas it appears that the report proper covers thirty-three pages; and whereas the accompanying documents embrace eight hundred and forty-eight pages: Therefore,
Be it resolved, That so much of said order as requires the printing of the accompanying documents be, and is hereby, rescinded, except upon the order of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Commerce a bill (S. No. 442) to amend section one of "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The bill provides that the act named in the title be amended by adding to section one the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That in case of goods, wares, and merchandise imported from a foreign country adjacent to the United States, the declaration in this section hereinbefore required may be made to, and the certificate indorsed by, the consul, vice consul, or commercial agent at or nearest to the port or place of clearance for the United States.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMISSION OF TAX LAW PENALTIES.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of presenting to the House, for immediate action, a joint resolution exempting all persons from the penalties and forfeitures imposed by the internal revenue law passed at this session, for such period of time, not less than twenty days, as will enable the persons affected thereby to obtain copies of said law and understand the provisions thereof.

SANDY BRUCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee on Accounts be directed to add fifteen dollars a month to the pay of Sandy Bruce, who attends to us so well in the bath-rooms.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

AMENDMENT OF THE TAX LAW.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am directed to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means House bill No. 1452, to repeal section one hundred and thirty-six of the act of June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to support the Government, and for other purposes," with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. It provides that section one hundred and thirty-six of the act of June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to support the Government, and for other purposes," be repealed, and that any legacy or succession tax that is now due and unpaid, or hereafter may become due by virtue and under said section, be released.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now ask that section one hundred and thirty-six be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 136. And be it further enacted, That where real estate shall become subject to a trust for any charitable or public purposes under any part or future disposition, which, if made in favor of an individual, would confer on him a succession, there shall be payable in respect of such real estate upon its becoming subject to such trusts or duty at the rate of six per cent. upon the amount or principal value of such real estate.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is proposed not to make that class of transfers subject to tax, as they are for charitable purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the bill will be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HELEN AND HELOISE LINCOLN.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 361) for the relief of Helen and Heloise Lincoln.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was received and read a first and second time. The preamble states that on or about the 5th day of January, 1868, the Kioway Indians, captured in Cook county, State of Texas, two female children, whose family name is unknown aged about three and five years, after having murdered their parents and all known relations; and that they have recently been recovered from those Indians, and are now in the care of J. H. Leavenworth, United States Indian agent, and are without any means of support. It then directs the Secretary of the Interior to reserve from any moneys due or to become due to the Kioway Indians the sum of $5,000 for each one of said children, to be used in such manner as he may deem expedient for their maintenance, education, and support, the eldest of the children to be known as Helen Lincoln and the youngest as Heloise Lincoln.

Mr. DELANO. I hope the gentleman will modify his resolution so as to provide that this money shall be invested in United States securities for the benefit of these children.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I accept that.

Mr. DELANO. I wish to make a single statement in reference to this joint resolution. [Cries of "Oh, no! let us pass it!"] Very well, then.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this resolution as it stands now allows the Secretary of the Interior to pay these Indians what shall be due to them, deducting $5,000; and it seems to me to be wrong to allow the Secretary of the Interior to pay any tribes of Indians which hold white women and children in captivity. I wish, therefore, to amend the resolution so as to cut off any annuity to any Indians who hold white women and children in captivity.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I do not object to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MULLINS. It does not go far enough. It should embrace people held in captivity of whatever color. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PEONAGE OF NAVAJOES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to present for immediate action a joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to aid in relieving from peonage women and children of the Navajo Indians. I think it will commend itself to every member of the House.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It authorizes and requests Lieutenant General Sherman to use the most efficient means his judgment will approve to reclaim from peonage the women and children of the Navajo Indians, now held in slavery in the territory adjacent to their homes, on the reservation on which the Navajo Indians have been confined.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish merely to say that there are now four thousand of these women and children held in peonage, and I desire that General Sherman shall have authority to use such means as his judgment approves to take them away from peonage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill (H. R. No. 1455) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes. It is merely to insert the word "not," which was omitted.

The bill was read a first and second time. It amends section forty-eight of the internal tax bill by inserting the word "not," so as to read, "thirteen dollars per dozen bottles, each bottle containing not more than one pint."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF MACHINERY.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill (H. R. No. 1456) to authorize the importation of machinery for repair only free of duty.

The bill was read a first and second time. It provides that machinery for repair may be imported into the United States without the payment of duty, under bond, to be given in double the appraised value thereof, to be withdrawn after said machinery shall have been repaired; and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to protect the revenue against fraud, and secure the identity and character of all such importations when again withdrawn and exported, restricting and limiting the export and withdrawal to the same port of entry where imported, and also limiting all bonds to a period of time of not more than six months from date of the importation.

Mr. BANKS. I think that ought not to pass.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a great deal of machinery for manufacturing sugar and machinery of other kinds used in the West Indies and other foreign countries where they have no means of repairing it. It has, therefore, to be brought back to this country or some other country to be repaired. But that cannot be done without paying a duty. The proposition is, by letting it in free of duty, to permit our mechanics to have the benefit of repairing this machinery, which otherwise would be taken to England or elsewhere to be repaired, and to reexport it after the repairs are made.

Mr. ELIOT. All right.

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think it is generally agreed all around that it is right.

Mr. PAINE. I think the object of the Committee of Ways and Means is right, but when the bill was read it did not strike me that it would carry out the object which the gentleman stated. It seemed to me that it might cover all cases where machinery is brought into this country to be used in repairing machinery, whether originally made in this country or not. I think the language is too broad.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the gentleman will find that the bill is so guarded, and that we have placed such restrictions in it as to guard against any possibility of fraud. The bill is generally asked for by the machinists of the country who are engaged in this work.

Mr. MILLER. I do not know that I have any serious objection to this bill, but I should prefer that all these questions in relation to the tariff should go over until the tariff is considered next session.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope my colleague will make no objection to this bill. It is simply to allow our own mechanics to repair machinery.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw the objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. JONES, of North Carolina, asked and obtained, leave to print some remarks on the condition of the southern States. [See Appendix.]

TRADE WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 322) relative to Prince Edward Island with a brief report in writing accompanied by a resolution. I ask that the joint resolution be read and then the report of the committee.

The joint resolution was read. It proposes to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to admit into the several ports of the United States free of duty the actual productions of Prince Edward Island, including fish, accompanied by satisfactory vouchers of the place of production, under such regulations as he may deem necessary, whenever the colonial Government of Prince Edward Island shall by law provide, first, for the free admission of all productions of the United States to the island; second, to admit to its ports and harbors, for shelter, to obtain supplies, and to refit, free of duty or impost, all American fishing vessels; third, to give license to fish in the waters adjacent to the island upon such terms that the license fee shall not exceed five dollars for any one vessel, &c.

Mr. ELIOT. Is this resolution properly before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is. The Committee of Ways and Means have a right to report at any time for commitment.

The Clerk read the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means having considered joint resolution (H. R. No. 322) relative to Prince Edward Island, and not being able to obtain at once and with exactness all the information needed before it would be wise and advisable, in their opinion, to take any definite action on the subject, have concluded as a preliminary measure, to submit to the House and recommend the passage of the following:

Resolved, That a select committee of three members be appointed by the Speaker, to whom shall be referred joint resolution No. 322 of the House, relative to Prince Edward Island, with instructions to inquire and report at the next session of this Congress the fullest and most reliable information they can obtain in regard to said colony of Prince Edward Island, including particularly whatever can be ascertained as to the kind and amount of imports and exports to and from the island, and the views and disposition as well as authority of the colonial government to enter into any particular or exceptional arrangement or agreement by legislative enactment with the United States, conceding and securing such privileges as to fisheries on the coast as are contemplated in said resolution. But no expense to the United States is to be incurred by said committee in the prosecution of their inquiries.

Mr. SCHENCK. The House will observe that the resolution which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means proposed legislative action by which negotiations or tenders for reciprocal legislation should be offered to the colony of Prince Edward Island.

The Committee of Ways and Means report that they do not think they have such exact and accurate information as would justify us in founding action upon it. The committee therefore recommend that the resolution be referred to a select committee of three persons, who shall inquire, without expense of any kind attending their inquiry, and report at the next session of this Congress, what are the exports and imports of that colony, what authority it has for legislative action, and what is the disposition of the people there to enter into an arrangement of this kind. The committee therefore recommend that action be postponed until full and complete and exact information can be obtained on these points.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr.

BUTLER,] who introduced the resolution, thinks that the committee might better recommend its passage. I have agreed to give him an opportunity to move an amendment so as to put the resolution on its passage; but I desire the House to understand that the Committee of Ways and Means do not recommend the passage of the resolution at this time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By leave of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I desire to call the attention of the House to this subject, which is a matter of very considerable importance. The difference between the action proposed by the committee and that which I desire is this: the Committee of Ways and Means want to put the matter off and have a select committee appointed to go, at their own expense, to the island, where there is no public conveyance, there to make an examination for the purpose of obtaining information for this House. There may be many patriotic gentlemen who will volunteer to serve upon such a committee; but I have not happened to see any such exhibition of patriotism. I do not think there is any use in such a committee. We have a very excellent report upon this matter by Mr. Derby and Mr. Brega, made under the direction of the Treasury Department.

I will state to the House, briefly, what I desire. Edward Island is about two hundred thousand square miles in extent, and embraces a million acres of land under cultivation. The people of that island are engaged in agriculture and in fishing. They have the finest harbors anywhere on our coast; but we are debarred from going there now because the government of the dominion, under the treaty of 1815, prevents any of our fishing vessels going into those harbors and laying there more than twenty-four hours without confiscation. And so great a burden is that on our fishermen that in 1856 three hundred sail of fishermen undertook to ride out a storm rather than go into the harbor, and one hundred sail and almost three hundred lives were lost.

My resolution proposes that we shall admit the productions of this island free of duty. The whole of the products of this island that they export everywhere are not more than $200,000 in value. They export only about twenty-five thousand dollars worth of fish of all sorts. They also have a few potatoes, some oats, and some barley. In return for allowing their exports to come into the country free of duty they propose to give our fishermen the right to enter their ports, to refit there, to victual their vessels, and to dry their fish, upon the nominal license of not exceeding five dollars a vessel. The license now is at the rate of two dollars per ton, or from forty to two hundred dollars per vessel, amounting to an almost entire prohibition. This resolution provides that in case the authorities of this island allow our fishing vessels to enter their harbors for a nominal license only, allowing them full and free use of their harbors, and the best fishing grounds in the world, which now they are almost wholly deprived of, we will allow their products to come into our country free, ours going free into their country. They consume from forty to fifty thousand dollars worth of flour each year, which would all come from the United States. Now, my friend from the New Bedford district [Mr. ELIOT] thinks this will interfere with the interests of his district.

Mr. ELIOT. I will state my own objections if I am allowed to do so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will allow the gentleman to state his objections, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not believe the House of Representatives, after the report from the Committee of Ways and Means that upon the examination they have made they do not think they possess sufficient information to justify their action upon the resolution of my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER,] I do not believe the House will be willing to pass the resolution, especially in view of some facts, which I will proceed to state.

Soon after the offering of this resolution by my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER,] and its reference to the committee, I received from Massachusetts a communication in behalf of the cod-fishing interests of that State, representing that the passage of this resolution, although it might possibly affect beneficially the mackerel interests of my colleague's constituents, would be disastrous to the cod-fishing interests of the country for this reason: if Prince Edward Island should be made a free port of entry, although it may be that now the exports of fish from there amount to but $20,000 a year, yet the time would speedily come when it would be made a depot for the introduction of cod-fish, which would by that channel come into the country free of duty. The fishing grounds to which my colleague refers are mackerel fishing grounds; and this resolution would be destructive to the cod-fishing interests of the country, by permitting the introduction of cod-fish free of duty by the way of Prince Edward Island.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, but that there may be reasons why some legislation should be had on this subject; but I insist that in the absence of all reliable information it would be manifestly unsafe at this period of the session for the House to pass this resolution, which is not recommended by any committee, but upon which the Committee of Ways and Means have, I may say, reported unfavorably. It would be wise, I believe, to adopt the report of the committee, so that between this time and the next session such information may be had as will enable the committee when we shall reassemble to report some action which may be safe and proper. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A word or two in reply to my colleague, [Mr. ELIOT.] In the first place, I do not believe that any codfish grow on that island.

Mr. ELIOT. But codfish will get there quickly enough.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot permit myself to be interrupted.

In the first place, I do not believe that any codfish grow on that island. If any do grow there I am content they shall come in free of duty. In the second place, I would like to know whether my colleague has read the report of Mr. Brega and that of Mr. Derby on this subject. If he has not, then I agree that he does not know anything about the matter, but he can easily obtain information, for the thing has been reported on fully. I represent as many cod-fishing vessels as does my colleague, quite as many. The Salem Board of Trade, the merchants of Boston, and others who fully understand the true interests of our State desire the passage of this resolution. It will be an entering wedge to enable us to get, in the fisheries of those waters, that fair consideration to which we are entitled.

Now, sir, I ask would my colleague spend the vacation in going to Prince Edward Island and getting this information at his own expense? If he would, then I want him put on this committee if it should be appointed. But, sir, I look upon this proposition of the committee as simply giving this matter the go-by. The committee propose that three members of this House shall spend the vacation, when they have their elections to attend to at home, in going at their own expense to visit this island, to which there is no public conveyance. I do not believe any member will want to go. The adoption of the proposition of the committee will simply give this question the go-by.

Mr. ELIOT. We had better give it the go-by than legislate in the dark on such a question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When the gentleman speaks of "legislating in the dark" he may speak for himself; everybody else understands this question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to enter into this question between mackerel and codfish, [laughter;] but it may be well enough to refresh the recollection of gentlemen of this House, who, I know, must all be posted in geography, but who may not have looked at the map with reference to this question so recently as some of the committee. This question is in some sense one of topography. Prince Edward Island, it will be remembered, lies in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, with Nova Scotia stretching out as one arm on the right, and the lower part of the Canadian dominion reaching around the gulf upon the left. The object is to get around Nova Scotia and obtain good relations with this little island one hundred and forty miles long lying inside. This may be all very well if it can be done, and we may make a good bargain by it. But my difficulty arises in part from information derived from one of these very gentlemen referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] I understand it to be doubtful whether any arrangement which Prince Edward Island as a distinct colony might make by legislative provision for conceding these advantages for fishing purposes would be recognized by Canada and by Nova Scotia, which border upon the same waters that encircle this island. And the committee, although they could obtain even to the bushel exact information from various statistical tables, and particularly from an interesting one which accompanies Colton's Atlas on this subject, as to the imports and exports of grain and other productions, have no means of knowing the disposition of the people or what may be considered their power as a colony on this subject of making a definitive and exceptional arrangement by legislative enactment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Ohio will do the justice of saying that this does not propose anything until Prince Edward Island has acted.

Mr. SCHENCK. We may do this thing with this little island and afterward be "snubbed" by being told that they had not the power to do this thing. We do not report against the resolution to keep open every question of an economical character like this which will result in good to the country. We have not proposed to report against that, but we have stated in the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means the information is not so exact and full in regard to the power and authority of the colony as to its condition and productive capacity. We think, therefore, it will be better to refer the resolution itself to a select committee, and that committee shall collect and report to the next session of Congress reliable information on this subject.

The gentleman makes an objection on this point. He says no three men appointed on that committee will make the trip at their own expense. It will be easy to test the sense of the House on striking out that part of the resolution. The Secretary of the Treasury might send out with little expense one of the revenue-cutters.

But, sir, it does not follow they must necessarily go there. I do not understand my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has ever been there, and yet he knows a great deal about it, a great deal about the resources of the island and the character of the people. The committee has not proposed the select committee shall visit the island, or go out of the United States, but simply to commission them to get all the information they can by investigation in proper quarters, by correspondence, or in any way they may deem best. I admit it would be better to visit the island; but that is a question apart from what the committee propose. If any gentleman wishes to offer an amendment which will cover that point I will agree to it. I wish the resolution of the committee to be read, so we may understand what it is the committee proposes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Fearful lest the House should not adopt my motion to pass the resolution, I will move to add these words: "except the Secretary of the Treasury put a proper revenue-cutter at the use of the committee for that purpose."

Mr. SCHENCK. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 26; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER under the rules ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, and Mr. VAN WYCK.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 40.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RATIFICATION OF FOURTEENTH ARTICLE.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections to report back the resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia ratifying the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution, with the recommendation that they be filed in the State Department.

It was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had agreed to the amendment of the House to a bill (S. No. 472) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security."

It also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 570) for a grant of lands granting the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific railroad and telegraph company, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SESSIONS OF COMMITTEES DURING THE RECESS.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That no one of the committees of this House be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, unless it be without increased expense to the Government.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF A CONTESTANT.

Mr. McCLURG, from the Committee of Elections, reported the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved. That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $1,500 to A. C. Hunt, in full compensation for expenses of contesting the seat of George M. Chilcott, Delegate in the Fortieth Congress from the Territory of Colorado.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I will not object to that if the gentleman will yield to allow me to offer an amendment covering a case passed upon by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. McCLURG. I am instructed by the committee to offer the resolution, and therefore cannot yield.

The SPEAKER. It is privileged question. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURG moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEMBERS-ELECT FROM GEORGIA.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections to report back the credentials of J. W. Clift and C. H. Prince, members-elect from the State of Georgia, that State having ratified the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and in all other respects having conformed to the requirements of law in regard to the admission of that State. These gentlemen will take the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. J. W. CLIFT and Mr. C. H. PRINCE accordingly appeared and were duly qualified by taking the oaths prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

Mr. DAWES. I am also instructed by the Committee of Elections to report back the credentials of P. W. Edwards and Samuel F. Gove, members-elect from the State of Georgia, and to state that these gentlemen are unable to take the oaths prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, they having participated in the rebellion, one having held office under the confederacy and the other having served in the confederate army. The gentlemen, however, have had their disabilities removed by the act of July 25, 1868, and the committee recommend that they be admitted to their seats upon taking the oath prescribed by the statute of July 11, 1868.

Mr. MULLINS. Is the evidence sufficient to satisfy the minds of the committee that all is right in this case?

Mr. DAWES. The evidence as to the removal of the disabilities of these gentlemen was submitted to the committee some time since, and they reported upon it. The presumption is that it was entirely satisfactory to that committee, as it appeared to be satisfactory to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MULLINS. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: whether he did not urge the passage of that bill very heavily and participate in it, as well as the balance of the House?

Mr. DAWES. I am sorry to say that I am usually "heavy" on these things, but I did not participate in that debate. I was absent when the bill passed. If I had been present, however, I would have recorded my vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to ask the gentleman if he proposes to let these red-handed rebels into Congress? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that any such have applied to be admitted, but they may if the gentleman's party gets into power. At present no such have presented themselves. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL F. GOVE and Mr. P. W. EDWARDS then appeared and were duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868.

PAY OF A CONTESTANT.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $2,500 to William McGroarty as full compensation for expenses of contesting the seat of WILLIAM H. HOOPER, Delegate in the Fortieth Congress from the Territory of Utah.

Mr. KERR, Mr. ALLISON, and others objected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULES.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
July 25, 1868.

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses be suspended for the residue of the session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that the Senate evidently understands that this is within the last three days of the session, and proposes to suspend the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules prohibiting the exchange of bills between the two Houses within the last three days of the session, and the sending of bills to the President on the last day of the session. The House has, however, ruled, the Chair having so decided, that these are not the last days of the session, as this is only a recess, and the last days will not occur until after the recess in September. The resolution will be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means if there is no objection.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Can bills be sent to the President unless we pass the resolution?

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt they can, as this is not within the last three days or the last ten days of the session.

Mr. SCHENCK. I beg leave to say that I have no doubt the Speaker is right, but the Senate take a different view, and as the Senate may act upon their view, they might be unwilling to unite with us in doing any business. I suggest, therefore, whether it would not be better to gratify the Senate by concurring in the resolution?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should be very unwilling to concede by concurring in the resolution that the Speaker decided wrong.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not see that it can do any harm to concur.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on concurring.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 55, noes 54.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to have the ruling of the Chair again stated, so that the House may understand what it is.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does not the resolution provide for suspending the rules during the last three days of the session? If so, it will not take effect until next September. I would like to have it read again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have read the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

"16. No bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the three last days of the session.

"17. No bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation on the last day of the session."

Mr. SCHENCK. I will submit, if it is in order, another motion, that the Speaker of the House be requested to communicate to the Senate that, by the construction given to the rules by the House of Representatives, it is not necessary to pass a concurrent resolution of this kind, as these are not the last days of the session, and that we are acting upon that construction. It is a case where the Senate construes the joint rules of the two Houses in one way and the House in another. I believe the House is right. There is no doubt about the Speaker being correct. This is not the end of the session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and to the House that he would prefer that the House, and not the Speaker, should send the message to the Senate. The Senate might not consider it altogether respectful for the Speaker of this House to decide that their construction of the joint rules was not correct.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well. Then I will move that the Clerk of the House be directed to notify the Senate that we construe the rules differently from what the Senate appear to do; that we do not hold that it is now within the last three days of the session, but that the session will not close until after the meeting in September next.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now state to the House that had the resolution of the Senate been concurred in the Chair would have felt bound to entertain motions to suspend the rules, upon the ground that such a concurrence would have been a construction that this was the last of the session.

The House resumed the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

CHEROKEES—NORTH CAROLINA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 1375, to transfer to the Department of the Interior certain powers and duties now exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with Indian affairs.

The amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill the following:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a new roll or class to be made of the North Carolina or eastern Cherokees, which shall be the roll upon which payments due said Indians shall be made.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the Committee of Indian Affairs to take the same supervisory charge of the Eastern or North Carolina Cherokees as of the other tribes of Indians.

The amendment of the Senate was then concurred in.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. HAMILTON. It seems to be utterly impossible for me to get in some resolutions I have drawn up for the impeachment of the President of the United States. I now rise to do the next best thing I can for the people of my State. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table, for consideration at this time, Senate bill No. 604, regulating the times and places of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read; after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read. The first section provides that the times and places of holding the United States district and circuit courts for the northern district of Florida shall hereafter be as follows: at Jacksonville on the first Monday of December; at Tallahassee, on the first Monday in February; at Pensacola on the first Monday of March. The second section provides that the terms of the United States court heretofore held at St. Augustine and Apalachicola shall be hereafter discontinued.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I believe the bill is all right and should be passed.

Mr. PHELPS. I would like to inquire why it is that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HAMILTON] cannot get in his resolutions of impeachment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer that question after this bill has been disposed of. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table, out of its order, the bill which has just been read.

Mr. PHELPS. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill is not before the House. The Chair will state that when the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HAMILTON] states that he is unable to obtain the floor in order to move resolutions for the impeachment of the President of the United States the gentleman does the Chair injustice, which the Chair supposes was unintentional on his part.

Mr. HAMILTON. I certainly did not mean anything of the kind.

The SPEAKER. When the House is proceeding with the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, as each bill is disposed of, before another bill is taken up any gentleman on either side of the House can present any question of privilege to the House for its consideration. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. HAMILTON] has sought twice to obtain the floor to introduce something which he says was a question of privilege. The Chair stated to him each time that he could not interrupt other business then pending for that purpose. The gentleman has not yet sought the floor when no other business was pending, as is now the case.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HAMILTON. I now rise to a question of privilege, and present the preamble and resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in violation of his oath of office, has put in jeopardy the Constitution of the United States, by causing to be turned over to the possession and control of the disloyal inhabitants of the States whose late rebellion subverted their legal governments the ten States lately in insurrection, and has obstructed the restoration of the Union by combining and coöperating with said disloyal inhabitants to establish therein governments not "republican in form;"

And whereas Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in disregard of his constitutional oath "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," has refused and failed to execute the laws of the United States known as the reconstruction acts, and provide for their reconstruction and restoration to the Union; and, perverting his high office of President of the United States to partisan purposes, still refuses to execute said laws, and officially denounces them as "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void," and declares the State governments formed in accordance with the provisions of said laws, and recognized by the Congress of the United States as the valid and legitimate governments of said States, to be "illegitimate and of no validity whatever;"

And whereas Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, by his failure to execute the laws, by his advice to individuals, his public speeches, proclamations, and messages, by his votes of constitutional acts passed by the Congress of the United States, by use of the executive patronage, by his whole administration of the laws of the United States, in so far as they relate to the States lately in rebellion, has brought about a civil and political hostility to the loyal States of the Union and the citizens thereof, to the Congress of the United States, and to the General Government, which, if not speedily repressed, will precipitate a now imminent insurrection within said States, and endanger the "domestic tranquility;"

And whereas Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, by his unlawful, unwarranted course, and dangerous, unprecedented conduct, encouraging instead of restraining opposition to the laws of the United States, has so revived the spirit of the late rebellion that the national peace is endangered, and has so administered the laws that the States lately in rebellion have been destitute of the protection of the governments of their respective States, in so far as reserved to them by the laws of the United States, and of the Government of the United States, until arson, rapine, murder, and assassination have become of every-day occurrence, and until the shedding of blood of loyal citizens scarcely excites comment, and has thus thrown every obstacle which his official position placed in his power in the way of bringing incendiaries, assassins, and murderers to justice, either by the civil authorities of said States, as reserved to them by act of Congress, or by the military power delegated by Congress to insure peace, order, and protection in the said States;

And whereas Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, threatens to use the power and authority of his high office of President to overthrow the republican State governments established in the States lately in rebellion by the constitutional authority of the Congress of the United States, and declares such to be his rebellious purpose, in the following alarming passage contained in his seditious, incendiary message to Congress on the 20th instant, to wit:

"It clearly follows that all the State governments organized in those States under acts of Congress for that purpose, and under military control, are illegitimate and of no validity whatever, and in that view the votes cast in those States for President and Vice President, in pursuance of the acts passed since the 4th of March, 1867, and in obedience to the so-called reconstruction acts of Congress, cannot be legally received and counted, while the only votes in those States that can be legally cast and counted will be those cast in pursuance of the laws in force in the several States prior to the legislation by Congress upon the subject of reconstruction."

And whereas, so long as Andrew Johnson occupies the office of President of the United States, there can be no administration of the Government in the South, no peace, no safety, either to the Government, States, or individuals, no "promotion of the general welfare," no protection to life, liberty, or property; and he has in all these many and several particulars been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors: Therefore,

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be, and he hereby is, impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House of Representatives during the late impeachment trial, are hereby instructed to immediately proceed to the bar of the Senate of the United States, and inform that body that the House of Representatives, in the name of all the people, have impeached Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and will in due time present particular articles of impeachment.

Resolved, That said managers prepare and report to this House as speedily as possible particular articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and that they have any and all power conferred upon them necessary to prepare and prosecute to final judgment such articles of impeachment as may from time to time be reported to and adopted by this House.

Mr. BOUTWELL and others addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is about to rule on this proposition. He rules that this is a question of privilege which the gentleman has the right to bring before the House when it is not engaged in the transaction of other business; but that part of the resolution which proposes to revive the board of managers, whose official functions have now expired, cannot, in the opinion of the Chair, be entertained except by unanimous consent or by a suspension of the rules, because the precedents in the British House of Commons, and also in the American Congress, are that when articles of impeachment have been agreed upon by the popular branch of the Government the managers are then to be elected to present those articles of impeachment. As to the managers formerly appointed by this House to conduct the impeachment of the President of the United States, though they were continued as a select committee for conducting a special investigation their official functions have expired, as has been heretofore decided by the Chair, the decision being acquiesced in by the House; and if impeachment should be voted by the House managers must be elected by the House to conduct that impeachment. The remaining portion of the resolution constitutes a question of privilege, and is before the House. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who is claiming his attention?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. My object in rising was to ask the gentleman from Florida to allow me to make a motion to refer the preamble and resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAMILTON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I make that motion, and on it demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I raise the question on the reception of these resolutions as a question of privilege, unless the gentleman from Florida will give me an opportunity to ask him some questions, and unless his answers should satisfy me to the contrary of the opinion I now entertain.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] raises the question of consideration he cannot debate it except by unanimous consent, as the question is undebatable.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not propose to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration must be raised, if at all, at the time a proposition is presented. It is now in order to raise that question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I propose to make it, unless the gentleman from Florida—

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration can be raised by any gentleman when a resolution is presented, whether it be a question of privilege or not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I make the point of order that the question of consideration is raised too late.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The Chair has already decided that it is not too late.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Chair decided that the resolution was before the House, and afterward the gentleman from Florida, being recognized as entitled to the floor, yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"When any motion or proposition is made, the question, Will the House now consider it? shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member or is deemed necessary by the Speaker; and it is competent for a member to raise the question of consideration upon a report, even though a question of privilege is involved in the report. But after a question has been stated, and its discussion commenced, it is too late to raise the question of consideration."

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] first, because the discussion had not commenced, and also for the additional reason that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] rose at the same time as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] The Chair gave the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts, with the assent of the gentleman from Florida; but the gentleman from Wisconsin remained standing, and made the point of order at the earliest moment at which he could obtain the attention of the Chair.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish it understood that I demanded the previous question on the motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The question of consideration must, however, be entertained and decided.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The first question before the House is whether it will entertain the question as one of privilege.

Mr. PHELPS. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The Speaker has announced this resolution is in part not in order. If part is inadmissible is it not all out of order?

The SPEAKER. The remaining portion is admissible. The gentleman from Florida withdrew that part which was not in order.

LEWIS SANDERS, DECEASED.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the Committee on Accounts be authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the House $100, to defray the funeral expenses of Lewis Sanders, who died while employed at the Capitol. We all recollect him. It is to be paid to his widow.

There was no objection, and it was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT AGAIN.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 31, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boutwell, Boyen, Brownell, Buckland, Buekley, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Culion, Dawes, Delano, Dowse, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eli, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Halsey, Hamilton, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hinds, Hopkins, Chester D. Smith, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—86.

So the House agreed to consider the question.

During the vote, Mr. TABER stated that Mr. HAIGHT was paired with Mr. PIKE.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE stated that Mr. FERRY was detained at his room by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the proposition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that it be laid on the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 30, nays 100, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Axtell, Baker, Beck, Boyden, Cary, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Graver, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Mann, Marshall, McCullough, Munger, Niblack, Phelps, Ross, Spalding, Stewart, Taber, Taffe, Lawrence S. Trimble, and Van Auker—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—90.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question on referring the resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 570) providing for the distribution of the reward offered by the President for the capture of Jefferson Davis.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 176) extending the benefits of an act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agricultural and the mechanical arts, approved July 2, 1862, as amended by act of July 23, 1866, to States lately in rebellion; also, a joint resolution (S. No. 175) relative to the recent contract for stationery for the Department of the Interior; in both of which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1021) in amendment of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States."

Also, that it had passed the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States.

The first amendment of the Senate was to strike out the words "for the protection of which the Government of the United States was established."

The second amendment of the Senate was to strike out section three and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign Government it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that Government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen; and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall, as soon as practicable, be communicated by the President to Congress.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate; and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRUPTION IN IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the committee appointed to inquire into alleged corruption in the trial of the impeachment of the President of the United States to report the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the select committee on alleged corruption in the impeachment trial be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentlemen will not be discharged until they have at least buried the body. [Laughter.]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not know what the resolution is, but I object to it out of personal consideration for the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

GOVERNMENT OF UNITED STATES TERRITORIES.

Mr. MULLINS. I ask leave to introduce a bill for present action, which will save $491,000 a year. It is a bill to provide for a more economical administration of the governments of the several Territories of the United States, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It provides that from and after its passage the Legislatures of the several Territories of the United States shall meet only once in every two years, and that the next meeting of each of said Legislatures shall begin two years from the date of their last session respectively; and that no money shall be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States to pay the legislative expenses of the several Territories for any other than biennial sessions. The bill also proposes to fix the salaries of the Governors of the respective Territories at $1,500 per annum.

Mr. KERR. I object to the bill.

Mr. MULLINS. Well, I cannot see how any one can object to that.

PENSION BILL.

Mr. PERHAM. I rise to a privileged question. I submit a report from a committee of conference.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, numbered as follows: 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with amendments, as follows: strike out all after the word "garrison," in line ten of the amendment to the end of line twelve; also, strike out all after the word "station," in line eighteen of the amendment; and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-first amendment, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: strike out all after the enacting clause of the amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the third section of an act entitled 'An act increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes,' approved July 25, 1866, shall be so construed as to place all pensioners whose right thereto accrued subsequently to the Revolution and prior to the 4th day of March, 1861, on the same footing as to rate of pension from and after the passage of said act as those who have been pensioned under acts passed since said 4th day of March, 1861; and the widows of revolutionary soldiers and sailors now receiving a less sum shall hereafter be paid at the rate of eight dollars per month;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-second amendment, and agree to the same, with an amendment, namely: strike out after line eleven of the amendment the following: "and in all cases pensions heretofore or hereafter granted by special acts of Congress shall be subject to be varied in amount according to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and insert the same as an additional section; and that the Senate agree to the same.

P. G. VAN WINKLE,
JOS. S. FOWLER,
ALEX. RAMSEY.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

SIDNEY PERHAM,
D. POLSLEY,
L. S. TRIMBLE.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PERHAM. If no gentleman desires to ask me any questions I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SIOUX OR DAKOTA INDIANS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 478) to amend an act entitled "An act for the removal of the Sisseton, Waupeton, Medawakonton, and Waukepete bands of Sioux or Dakota Indians, and for the disposition of their lands in Minnesota and Dakota," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ALLISON moved that the bill be reported to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANDREW S. CORE.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a joint resolution upon the table which has been sent from the Senate, to correct an error in a bill passed at this session. The original bill came from the Senate, was agreed to, perhaps without sufficient consideration, and reported favorably upon by the Committee of Ways and Means, exactly in the form in which it passed the Senate, and they say at the Treasury Department they cannot understand it. I ask that the joint resolution be taken up and passed.

The joint resolution (S. No. 172) to construe an act entitled "An act to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core," was read for information. It provides that the act to which it refers shall be so construed as to authorize and direct the accounting officers to settle and close the accounts of Andrew S. Core by crediting him with the amount of such collectable or unaccounted for tax lists or bills placed in his hands for collection as they may be satisfied have been lost or destroyed by reason of rebel raids and have not been collected by him.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEPHEN G. MONTANO.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 553, to pay Stephen G. Montano, a citizen of Peru, an unpaid balance of money awarded to him by the mixed commission authorized by the convention of January 12, 1863, between the United States and Peru; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. WELKER. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOIS CLARK.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 569, granting relief to Lois Clark; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. ORTH. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM HENRY OTIS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 279, for the relief of William Henry Otis; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ACCOUNTS WITH THE STATES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 94, directing the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever any State shall have been or may be in default for the payment of interest or principal on investments in its stocks or bonds held by the United States in trust, to retain the moneys due to such States from the United States; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that whenever any State shall have been, or may be, in default of the payment of interest or principal on investments in its stocks or bonds held by the United States in trust, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retain the whole, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of any moneys due on any account from the United States to such State, and to apply the same to the payment of such principal and interest, or either, or to the reimbursement of any sum of money advanced by the United States on account of such interest; provided that there shall be an account rendered in the first instance to the States in default showing the amount of moneys that have been withheld from the States in default on account of sales of public lands, or on any other account.

Mr. ORTH. I move that the bill be amended by striking out all after the word "Provided," and inserting in lieu thereof that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there shall be an account rendered in the first instance to the several States, showing the amount due to the United States from each State, or to the States respectively from the United States, whether on account of such investment and advance by the United States, or on account of sales of public lands, or on account of money advanced and expenses incurred in aid of the Government to suppress the rebellion; and such account shall be so rendered as to place all of the States upon the same footing in regard to the adjustment of their respective accounts with the United States, of whatever nature; and whatever balance may be due to any State upon the basis aforesaid shall be allowed and paid; and the Treasurer of the United States shall call upon all such States as may be in arrears to the United States for payment of whatever balance may be due from such States respectively.

Mr. ORTH. I call the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not call upon us to vote upon such an important bill as this without our knowing anything about it.

Mr. ORTH. I will state what I know about it. The object of the bill is to effect a settlement of accounts between the United States and the several States in regard to matters growing out of the war, principally in regard to the five per cent. fund. The passage of the bill is required before the accounting officers of the Treasury can settle those accounts.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. It looks to me as if this was a bill to pay some of these State claims which we have already once refused to pay.

Mr. ORTH. Not at all.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I hope the bill will be referred to a committee. It proposes to settle all the accounts of all the States of the Union, which will include all the war claims.

Mr. ORTH. The object is merely to allow a set-off, in order to effect a settlement of unliquidated accounts between the States and the General Government. It is for the benefit of the General Government. I insist upon the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 39, noes 29; no quorum voting.

Mr. ORTH. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] will not insist upon his opposition to this bill.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I insist upon knowing something about this very important bill before I can vote upon it.

Mr. PAINE. I think there ought to be either a better understanding of this bill, or tellers upon ordering the previous question upon it.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ORTH and Mr. SCOTFIELD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 66, noes 45.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, which was upon the amendment of Mr. ORTH.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I rise to a point of order upon the amendment. The bill itself is a little bill to authorize the United States to retain from the amount due a State the sum for which the State may be in default. The amendment is a provision to cover up all the war claims of all the States with the United States. The same proposition has been up here in different shapes this session, being at some times defeated and at other times referred. I take it that such a proposition cannot be attached as an amendment to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Without deciding whether the amendment would have been ruled germane if the point had been made in time, the Chair will state that it is now too late to raise the point. The amendment has been received and debated for some time. The previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered to be put upon the bill and amendment. The argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] as to the relevancy of the amendment might have force if addressed to the House as a reason why the amendment should not be agreed to.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The amendment is a very big thing.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] whether the purport and effect of this joint resolution is not to authorize the decision of a question which has been in controversy for some years, affecting the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, a question growing out of the construction of the national road through those States. As I understand, this is a proposition coming from the State of Illinois, that State claiming from the General Government two or three million dollars, said to have been derived by the General Government from the sale of public lands that were donated to construct the national road through the States I have named. I understand that this bill involves that question, which has been submitted to the Treasury Department, referred to the Comptroller of the Treasury, and by him decided against the claim of Illinois, and that the purpose of this bill is to place that claim in such a condition that it can be settled in another manner.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, if any gentleman objects. The House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. ORTH. I hope the gentleman will not object to my making an explanation.

Mr. PILE. I do not object at present.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] that I know nothing of the claim of the State of Illinois, to which he alludes.

Mr. WELKER. I do.

Mr. ORTH. My amendment can of course have nothing to do with the State of Illinois or the State of Ohio, unless those States have valid claims against the Government. This bill, with the amendment, presents to my mind one of the simplest of all questions. The object is simply to refer to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department the question of the settlement of the accounts between the Government of the United States on the one part and the different States of this Union on the other part. It is not proposed that Congress shall settle these accounts, but that they shall go to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury. The gentleman from Ohio, if he observes the words of the bill and the proviso which I have offered, must see that they do not recognize any claim that is not now valid against the General Government; they do not revive any claim upon which an adverse decision has been made. The simple provision is that where the State is indebted to the General Government on account of trust funds, which is the case with my own State, a proper deduction shall be made therefor upon a settlement of the war debts or any other matters standing between the State and the United States. In other words, it provides for a general settlement between the Government of the United States and all the States of this Union that may have claims against the General Government.

Now, what objection can there be to such a settlement as that? It is proposed to intrust it to the officers of the General Government. We do not propose to provide for the revival of a single claim that has been decided upon adversely by the Government or any Department of the Government. It is simply provided that where valid claims now exist in favor of the United States against any State, those claims shall be investigated; if on the other hand any State has a claim against the United States, such claim is likewise to be investigated. Where any amount is found due from the United States to the State, that amount is to be paid; and where, on the contrary, a balance is found due by the State, the United States is to call on the State for the payment of that balance. The object is simply to expedite the settlement of accounts between the General Government and the various States of the Union.

Mr. WELKER. Mr. Speaker, I perceive from the remarks of my friend from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] that he does not understand the whole import of this bill. Now, I happen to know that upon this claim on behalf of the State of Illinois, growing out of the very subject that is involved in this bill, the Comptroller of the Treasury has made a decision adverse to the claim; and that the purpose of this bill is to take the decision of that question of making up the accounts in relation to these claims from the Comptroller of the Treasury, and to put it into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

Mr. ORTH. If the gentleman is correct, what does the committee propose? That it shall be referred to the very officer who has decided against the claim, as the gentleman has said. Is the gentleman unwilling to refer it to that officer, who has already decided against the claim?

Mr. WELKER. It involves a larger amount of money than I perceive he thinks is involved.

Mr. ORTH. I do not know how much it involves.

Mr. WELKER. I do not think we should pass it.

Mr. ORTH. We provide that our officers shall make the settlement, and when that settlement is made and the balance shall be struck it shall be paid, whichever side it may be on.

Mr. RAUM. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. It is provided that said account shall be so adjusted as to place all the States upon the same footing in regard to the adjustment of their respective accounts with the United States, of whatever nature. What is that put in there for?

Mr. ORTH. The object of it is this: where a settlement, for instance, has been had with the State of Ohio, then the same basis shall be adopted with reference to the State of Illinois; that the same rule applied to the State of Ohio shall be applied to Illinois.

Mr. SPALDING. Is the same rule to be applied also to the rebellious States?

Mr. ORTH. If any rebel State has a claim against us for helping to put down the rebellion would my friend from Ohio refuse to pay it?

Mr. PAINE. During the Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Congresses we have had a select committee to take charge of this subject of war claims of the loyal States, and the effect of this amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is to transfer to a single officer, to wit, the Secretary of the Treasury, to dispose of this vast subject involving millions upon millions of dollars. For one, sir, I am not willing that a subject which has involved so much labor and so much difficulty should be intrusted to him now.

Mr. ORTH. Let me remind the gentleman that no other officer is authorized.

Mr. KELSEY. I object to further debate.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. ORTH. Let it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my motion.

It was so referred.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed bills of the following titles, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1446) for the relief from legal and political disabilities of Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn;

A bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1131) regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases for the protection of officers and agents of the Government, and for the better protection of the Treasury against unlawful claims.

It further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with inclosures, relative to the rights of freedmen under the third article of the treaty with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, relative to the removal of certain Indians, and asking an appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INVENTORY OF FURNITURE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Doorkeeper of the House, transmitting an inventory of furniture in the several committee-rooms, as required by the twenty-seventh rule of the House; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

PURCHASE OF HOUSE STATIONERY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
UNITED STATES, WASHINGTON, D. C.,
July 23, 1863.

SIR: A question having been raised yesterday in the House respecting the prices paid for writing paper the past year, I have, on the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, had a statement prepared of the quantities purchased for the use of the House, the persons from whom purchased, the gross amounts paid, and the weight of the paper. The statement is appended, and shows that—

French & Richardson furnished 810 reams.....	$3,159 00
T. W. Price furnished 383½ reams (lithographed) for.....	2,781 35
Gingorly & Myers, legal cap and engrossing paper, 150 reams for.....	801 80
Philp & Solomons, 160 reams for.....	763 46

All of this was purchased under contract with the lowest bidder, except the lithographed paper, which cannot be advantageously contracted for in that way.

I may be allowed to add that under the system of bidding which has prevailed in this office for the last five years, the Government has the advantage of a separate bid for each article, and of the active competition which exists among the trade; and that I have unofficially been informed that the joint Committee on Retrenchment propose to make this system obligatory upon all branches of the public service.

From the accompanying table it will be found that our commercial note paper ranged from $2 50 to $3 11, according to weight, letter paper from $4 47 to $5 58, according to weight, and foolscap from $5 74 to $6 70, according to weight. These prices are believed to be as low as the market afforded. It has been my aim to invite competition, and secure the best articles for the smallest amount of money; and I have reason to believe that a comparison of prices will prove that a considerable measure of success has attended this effort.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
EWD McPHERSON,
Clerk House Representatives United States.
Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker House Representatives United States.

Mr. DAWES. In connection with that letter I desire to say that in the remarks I made yesterday I had not the slightest intention of impugning the integrity of the Clerk of this House, or any officer of the House. I do not believe there is a man living more honest than the Clerk of this House. I spoke of an evil that existed about the Government, and I hope the plan adopted by the Clerk of the House will ultimately bring about a reform of that evil.

The letter was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Retrenchment.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. McCULLOUGH, from the minority of the Committee on Accounts, under the authority given yesterday, presented a minority report; which was ordered to be printed with the majority report, and laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. MOORE, his Private Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1427) to establish certain post roads;

An act (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 451) providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 1376) for the relief of loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

STATIONERY FOR INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask the House to take up a joint resolution which has just passed the Senate (S. No. 175) relative to the recent contracts for stationery for the Department of the Interior. I hold in my hand a report made by Senator PATTERSON, from the Committee on Retrenchment, to the Senate. I will not read it, but I will refer to one item in regard to the bids for stationery. The report shows that there were bids for various classes of stationery by Messrs. Blanchard & Mohun, by Messrs. Philp & Solomons, by Messrs. Coyle & Towers, and by Messrs. Dempsey & O'Toole, and that the contract was made with the highest instead of the lowest bidder. The lowest bid was about eight thousand dollars, and the highest $32,000.

The joint resolution was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to annul and cancel the contract made by him with Messrs. Dempsey & O'Toole for supplying the Department of the Interior and the several bureaus and officers thereof with stationery for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, under the advertisement issued May 25, 1868, and to enter into a contract for the articles mentioned in said advertisement with Messrs. Blanchard & Mohun, the latter being the lowest and best bidder therefor.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

PENSION BILLS PASSED.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks consent to lay before the House five Senate bills which have been examined by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that they may be passed.

There was no objection; and bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table, received their several readings, and were passed:

A bill (S. No. 598) for the relief of Mary Scott;

A bill (S. No. 606) granting a pension to Robert Watson;

A bill (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Nancy Smith;

A bill (S. No. 634) granting a pension to Violet Henry; and

A bill (S. No. 630) granting an increase of pension to Nancy A. Stocks.

REBECCA C. MEEKER.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 597) granting a pension to Rebecca C. Meeker was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812.

W. H. MACDONALD, ETC.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, and the same were placed on the Speaker's table:

A bill (S. No. 361) for the relief of W. H. MacDonald, late acting United States consul at Capetown, Cape of Good Hope; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 36) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the bark Aug. Guardein.

CAPTURE OF JEFF DAVIS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the rewards offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses that the Senate recede from their first, second, third, and fourth amendments.

W. B. WASHBURN,
LEWIS W. ROSS,
Managers on the part of the House.
TIMOTHY O. HOWE,
HENRY WILSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I simply wish to say that the Senate recede from their amendments, and the bill is just as it passed the House.

The SPEAKER. Then if the Senate recedes from its amendments the bill has passed, and the report will be entered on the Journal.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn.

Mr. BINGHAM. The amendment of the Senate proposes to add the names of a number of persons in Louisiana. I move that it be concurred in, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. PAINE. I would ask if the gentleman understands that there are any names inserted in this bill except from Louisiana?

A MEMBER. There are one or two from Arkansas.

Mr. KELLEY. I understand that one of the persons whose names have been inserted by the Senate was a graduate of West Point, or rather a gentleman who left West Point before he had graduated to take service in the rebel army. He was a general in the rebel service, and has resisted the entire work of reconstruction.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I move to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate and ask a conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker thereupon appointed Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. PAINE, and Mr. BECK managers of the conference on the part of the House.

LIGHTING OF WASHINGTON STREETS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington, District of Columbia.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out of the second section of the House amendment all after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the mayor and the city councils of the city of Washington be, and they are, authorized to contract with the Washington Gas-Light Company for the term of one year, and so from year to year until otherwise provided by law, at such rates as may be agreed upon, not exceeding the maximum now fixed by law, for all the illuminating gas required for the avenue and street lamps and public offices of the city, and public grounds under the control of said city.

Mr. KOONTZ. I move that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. WELKER. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be on concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that this joint resolution proposes to increase the price of gas in this city.

Mr. KOONTZ. By no means; it proposes to reduce it. The cost heretofore has been $3 42 per thousand feet, and the amendment of the House to the original resolution proposes to reduce it to three dollars per thousand feet.

Mr. WELKER. The difference between the Senate amendment and the joint resolution as it passed the House is that the House fixed upon the Government a contract for ten years, while the Senate amendment provides that the contract shall be made with the gas company from year to year.

Mr. KOONTZ. If the Senate amendment is concurred in we will not be able to get the gas at the reduced rate, for it is impossible for the company to furnish it at the price proposed by the House, except they have a contract for a term of years. The uniform custom all over the country is to allow contracts to be made in similar cases for a term of years.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it proposed to charter a new company?

Mr. KOONTZ. It is not.

Mr. MAYNARD. If it was I might be induced to vote for this joint resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. Is this bill to fasten upon the community the price of three dollars per thousand feet of gas for ten years to come?

Mr. KOONTZ. It proposes to reduce the price of gas from three dollars and forty-two cents to three dollars per thousand feet. The committee find upon examination in regard to forty of the principal gas companies in the country that the average price is three dollars and eighty-three cents per thousand feet. It will be impossible for this company to furnish gas at three dollars per thousand feet unless they are allowed a contract for a term of years.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman think it worth while to fasten a monopoly upon this community for a term of years?

Mr. KOONTZ. This is not to fasten a monopoly upon the community; it is to secure a saving to the Government.

Mr. WELKER. The sub-committee, to which this subject was referred, I understand, did not inquire as to the price of gas furnished to city authorities, but only as to the price of gas furnished to individuals.

Mr. KOONTZ. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] concurred in the joint resolution as reported from the committee of the House; in fact it was drawn to meet his views in the case. I will say that in the city of Philadelphia, where the gas is furnished by the corporation, the price is $2 95 per thousand feet. We propose to put it at three dollars per thousand feet in this city, only five cents more than in Philadelphia. Inasmuch as the city of Philadelphia is so much nearer the coal mines than Washington is I do not think the difference in the price is any too much. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and being taken it was concurred in, upon a division—ayes sixty-eight, noes not counted.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES—SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. BOWEN. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table, out of its regular order, for consideration at the present time, Senate joint resolution No. 176, extending to the States lately in rebellion the benefits of the act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, approved July 2, 1862, and amended by act of July 23, 1866.

The joint resolution was read for information. The preamble recites that under the provisions of the act of Congress, approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," and under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 23, 1866, entitled "An act to amend the fifth section of an act entitled 'An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts,'" approved July 2, 1862, extending the time within which the provisions of the original act shall be accepted and such colleges established, the several States and Territories became entitled under certain conditions to grants of land and land scrip; that by a joint resolution approved March 29, 1867, the issue or delivery of such land scrip to any of the States lately in rebellion against the United States, except the State of Tennessee, was prohibited until such States should be fully restored to their rights as States by Congress; and that several of the States lately in rebellion have already been fully restored to their rights as States by Congress. The joint resolution therefore provides that the issue of land scrip to the States thus fully restored to their rights as States by Congress be authorized and directed under the conditions and limitations prescribed in the acts recited, and that this authority and direction shall apply to States lately in rebellion not yet fully restored to their rights as States by Congress, so soon as they shall be thus restored. All amounts already issued to either of those States are legalized and declared to be a part of the share of such States.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does not this apply to all the southern States.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1181) regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases for the protection of officers and agents of the Government, and for the better defense of the Treasury against unlawful claims.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:
Provided, however, That no judgment recovered in accordance with this act shall be paid by the United States unless the amount received by the defendant as the proceeds of the transaction which was the foundation of the suit, shall have been paid into the Treasury, except upon an appropriation duly made therefor after a full examination of the claim upon its merits.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE EXPENSES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That there be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, for the purpose of building an arched roadway from Tiber creek, on North Capitol street, leading to the Government Printing Office, provided the city of Washington will appropriate a sufficient additional amount to complete it.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to Henry B. Ste. Marie the sum of $10,000 for services and information in the arrest of John H. Surratt in the kingdom of Italy, charged with the crimes of conspiracy and murder; and the joint resolution for the relief of Henry B. Ste. Marie, approved July 20, 1868, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. ROSS. I make the point of order that as this amendment makes an appropriation of money it must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and ask the appointment of a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] that this amendment contains an appropriation, and must first be considered in Committee of the Whole. If that point is insisted on the question cannot now be taken in the House on concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that there are only two things provided for in this amendment of the Senate. The first is to remedy an omission in our previous legislation by which we gave to Ste. Marie a reward of $10,000, but omitted in the bill to make any specific appropriation. The other part of the amendment simply provides for building a bridge over the Tiber, so as to make a convenient thoroughfare to the Government Printing Office. This is the whole effect of the amendments.

Mr. ROSS. I will not withdraw my objection unless I have the right to make it again when the conference report is submitted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You can.

The SPEAKER. The right will be reserved. The bill is before the House.

Mr. STOKES. My friend is laboring under a mistake. This House passed a bill, and it was concurred in by the Senate, appropriating $10,000 to this Henri Ste. Marie for information furnished and services rendered by him. It was provided that it should be paid out of a certain fund. It now turns out there is no fund belonging to that Department. He, therefore, fails to get the money that the House and Senate intended he should get. I insist, therefore, we should concur in the Senate amendment providing $10,000 for Henri Ste. Marie.

The Senate amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved that the House request a conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, Mr. STOKES, and Mr. ROSS, as managers of said conference on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867;

An act (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws; and

An act (H. R. No. 1275) relating to the Alexandria canal.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1868; when the Speaker signed the same.

MOUNT VERNON ASSOCIATION.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope I will have consent to take up a bill in relation to the Mount Vernon Association.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

WEST WISCONSIN RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 152) to extend the time for the completion of the West Wisconsin railroad; which was read a first and second time. It proposes to further extend the time fixed and limited by an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin," approved May 5, 1864, for the completion of the railroad from Tomah, in the county of Monroe, to St. Croix river or lake, between townships twenty-five and thirty-one, for a period of three years, to the West Wisconsin Railroad Company, a corporation established by the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and which, by the laws of that State, is entitled to the land grant made in the second section of the act of May 5, 1864; but if the railway company shall not have completed the railroad from Tomah to Black River falls on or before the expiration of one year from the passage of the resolution it is to be null and void.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That joint resolution has already been passed.

Mr. COVODE. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, a company incorporated under the laws of the Territory of Colorado, is hereby authorized to connect its road and telegraph with the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph at or near Cheyenne, and with the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, at Denver, and shall have a uniform gauge, rate of freight, and fare, and charge for hauling of cars and the privileges and immunities, except subsidy in bonds, and be subject to the obligations of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and its branches, and to aid in its construction shall have like grants of lands, right of way, with like conditions, limitations, and privileges: Provided, That patents may be issued to said company whenever it shall have completed twenty consecutive miles of its railroad and telegraph line, instead of forty miles, as now provided by law, whenever said company shall file in the Department of the Interior a certificate of the Governor and surveyor general of Colorado, whether a Territory or a State, duly sworn to by them before the judge of some court of record in Colorado, that twenty consecutive miles of the railroad and telegraph line of said company have been fully completed in a good and substantial manner, as contemplated by this act; and upon the connection of the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph, eastern division, with said railroad and telegraph at Denver City, said company shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as if the whole line had been constructed by said eastern division company. The line from Denver to Cheyenne shall be taken in lieu of its construction of said portion of its route, and all the provisions contained in the several acts of Congress relating to the operation of the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph, the Central Pacific of California, and the branches of said Union Pacific railroad and telegraph so far as the Government, the public, and said railroad and branches are concerned, shall apply to the operation of said Denver Pacific railway and telegraph, the same as if they were here repeated. The design being to provide that the said road shall for the purpose of through business be operated without change of cars or breaking bulk.

And be it further resolved, That the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, may mortgage that part of its road between the point where its subsidy in bonds shall terminate and Denver City, together with its rolling-stock, to an amount not exceeding $32,000 per mile, which point shall be held and construed under existing laws to be at or near Cheyenne Wells, in Colorado, and not further west than the meridian of said wells; and the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company may mortgage its road and rolling-stock to a like amount, for the purpose of enabling said companies to borrow money to construct their said roads.

And be it further resolved, That this act shall not take effect and go into operation until the said Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, shall, by a vote of its directors, have given its consent to the same, and have filed a certificate to that effect under the corporate seal of said company, attested by its president and secretary, in the Department of the Interior. And the grants herein made to said Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company are made upon condition that said company shall complete and put in operation its whole line of railroad and telegraph by the 1st day of January, A. D. 1870.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that is not germane.

The SPEAKER. It is not germane. The title of a bill controls its scope, except where, in the body of the bill, it has a scope beyond the title.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Would it be in order to offer it as an amendment to a bill that is already a law? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the President of the United States having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill (S. No. 567) relative to the Freedmen's Bureau, and providing for its discontinuance, with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to reconsider the same, and resolved that the said bill do pass, two thirds of the Senate agreeing thereto.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the foregoing message from the Senate, together with the message of the President of the United States; which was read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

Believing that a bill entitled "An act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau, and providing for its discontinuance" interferes with the appointing power conferred by the Constitution upon the Executive, and for other reasons which, at this late period of the session, time will not permit me to state, I herewith return it to the Senate, in which House it originated, without my approval.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 25, 1868.

Mr. ELIOT. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass this bill? That question is required by the Constitution to be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 23, not voting 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Bromwell, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Corode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Deweese, Dixon, Dockery, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Halsey, Hamilton, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kootz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Longbridge, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Peckham, Peters, Pierce, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—115.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Axtell, Beck, Cary, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Mann, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Ross, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, and Van Auker—23.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Bromall, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Cliff, Cook, Cornell, Dodge, Donnelly, Edwards, Ela, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Phelps, Pike, Price, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Root, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, John Trimble, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—82.

The SPEAKER. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, and the House having been notified that in the Senate of the United States upon a similar reconsideration two thirds of that body also agreed to the passage of the bill, I do declare, by the authority of the Constitution of the United States, that the act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau, and providing for its discontinuance, has become a law notwithstanding the objections of the President thereto.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ARNELL said that his colleague, Mr. TRIMBLE, of Tennessee, was absent; if present he would vote ay.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 722) for the relief of Sally C. Northrop;

An act (H. R. No. 1366) for the relief of Captain A. G. Olivar;

An act (H. R. No. 1365) for the relief of Captain Thomas W. Miller;

An act (H. R. No. 834) for the relief of Hon. George W. Bridges, a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress;

An act (H. R. No. 433) for the relief of Palemon John;

An act (H. R. No. 1322) for the relief of Major F. F. Stevens, assistant paymaster United States Army;

An act (S. No. 472) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security," and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 540) to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 295) for the relief of Eliza Mascher, widow of John F. Mascher;

An act (S. No. 209) to incorporate the Evening Star Newspaper Company;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 296) giving the assent of the United States to the construction of certain wharves in the harbor of Oswego, New York; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 147) for the relief of Jonathan S. Turner.

MOTION FOR A RECESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House take a recess. [Loud cries of "Oh, no," and "Not yet."]

The SPEAKER. To what time does the gentleman move to take a recess?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Ten o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state the condition of the public business, as it is his duty to do at this stage of the session. There are two bills now in the hands of conference committees that have not reported. The Committee on Enrolled Bills have not yet reported the bill in regard to the rights of naturalized citizens abroad, which has to be signed in open House by the Speaker and the President of the Senate before it can be sent to the President for his signature. After to-day, the Chair does not believe, from the votes cast to-day on the yeas and nays on the veto and other important propositions, there will be any quorum. If the House now takes a recess until ten o'clock on Monday we shall lose all the bills on the Speaker's table, as to the value of which the Chair is not informed and expresses no opinion, besides the bills which are before conference committees, and possibly other bills which cannot be enrolled in time to receive the signature of the President.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Now, can I make a little speech?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Speaker at the present stage of the session to inform the House of the condition of the public business. The present Speaker has done it, and all his predecessors have done it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I did not object to the Chair making his statement.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to state some reasons why we should take a recess.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why did not the gentleman object to the Speaker's speech?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Because it was his duty to make the statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] drew a distinction between the Presiding Officer making a statement of the condition of business and a member making a speech.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is the official duty of the Speaker to do it.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Speaker is right.

The SPEAKER. It is the Speaker's duty to do it, and he would be derelict if he did not do it.

The question was put on the motion of Mr.

WASHBURN, of Illinois; and there were—ayes 20, noes 93.

So the motion for a recess was disagreed to.

NEW MEXICO ELECTION CONTEST.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the resolution which I send to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide upon it after it is read.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I understand from the chairman of the Committee of Elections that there is no objection to it at any rate.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the time for taking evidence in the case of the contested election for a seat in Congress as Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico be extended to the 15th day of November, 1868.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of privilege.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAPANESE STUDENTS OF NAVAL ACADEMY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to admit certain persons to the Naval Academy; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the joint resolution be put upon its passage. It explains itself.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, which authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the Naval Academy at Annapolis not exceeding six persons, to be designated by the Government of the empire of Japan; but no expense is thereby to accrue to the United States, and the Secretary of the Navy may in the case of these persons modify or dispense with any provisions of the rules and regulations of the Academy which circumstances may, in his opinion, render necessary or desirable.

Mr. KELLEY. The resolution provides for the education of not exceeding six Japanese youths, designated by the Government of the empire, at the expense of the empire.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 159, relating to the Western Pacific railroad; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask that this bill be now put upon its passage.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, no.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Western Pacific Railroad Company of California shall be permitted to occupy for the purposes of a depot, store-houses, and other necessary fixtures so much of the island known as Yerba Buena, or Goat Island, in the bay of San Francisco, California, as may, within one year from the time this act shall take effect, be designated by the General of the Army of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of War, as not being required in time of peace for military purposes; which privilege shall, however, be terminable at the pleasure of Congress, and may be suspended whenever the United States shall be engaged in war or in imminent danger thereof, and notice of such determination shall be given to the company, its successors or assigns, by the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President. And in case of such suspension of privilege it shall be the right of the United States to take possession of the part of the island subject to the privilege, together with all buildings and other fixtures erected thereon by the company, and to occupy and use the same for military purposes during the war, and so long thereafter as shall be deemed necessary by the Secretary of War, with the like approval; and the Western Pacific Railroad Company are also authorized to locate and construct a railroad thence, by the shortest and most practicable route, to a point on its present line at or south of the city of Stockton, and they are enfranchised with all the grants, privileges, benefits, and made subject to all the conditions of the several acts of Congress relating to the company and its railroad and telegraph line; provided that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize any grant or subsidy in bonds for any road built under this act, or to increase the subsidies in bonds, beyond that accruing under existing lines of location and laws heretofore passed providing for the construction of the Pacific railroad; provided further, that no work shall be constructed by the said company between the main land and said island which will, in the judgment of the War Department, injuriously affect the navigation of the harbor of San Francisco; and provided further, that on the determination or suspension of the privilege hereby granted, and on the United States taking possession of that part of the island to which this privilege applies, the Government of the United States shall not be required to make compensation for any structures or buildings thereon, or for the use or occupation of the island or structures; and provided further, that this act shall not impair the rights or claims of persons in possession of the island of Yerba Buena at the time of the late military occupation thereof.

Mr. HIGBY. I propose to yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ECKLEY,] a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, to make a statement. Then I will make a brief statement myself, after which I will give an opportunity to the other side to be heard. But I wish to hold control of the matter for the present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman as entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am, also, a member of the Committee on the Public Lands. I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] will yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. HIGBY. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HOPKINS] for five minutes after the gentleman from Ohio has spoken.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will yield to me, also, for five minutes.

Mr. HIGBY. Certainly.

Mr. ECKLEY. This bill has been considered by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and they have agreed to it. It has also been submitted to and considered by the Committee on the Public Lands. Any one who will take the trouble to look at this proposition will see that this is the natural terminus of the Pacific railroad. It is true there is a controversy about this island; it is claimed by individuals, and also claimed by the Government. This bill merely provides that this Western Pacific railroad shall be allowed to have its terminus on the island of Yerba Buena, subject to the regulations of the Secretary of War.

I think every necessary guard is thrown around this bill. It simply gives the right of way on the island—not the island itself, but the right of way—to this railroad company. This being the great thoroughfare that is eventually to control, to a very great extent, not only the trade of this country, but the trade of Asia, it is right and proper that the terminus should be as near the city of San Francisco as possible, that city being the great emporium for the commerce of the Pacific. This is the nearest point of land in the control of the Government which can be given to this company for this purpose. That is the reason which actuated the Committee on the Public Lands in deciding in favor of this bill.

Mr. HIGBY. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOPKINS.]

Mr. HOPKINS. As a member of the Committee on the Public Lands of this House in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ECKLEY,] also a member of that committee, I desire to say that to my knowledge this bill has never been formally considered by that committee. The subject has been talked over; we have had various propositions before us during the entire session, some of them exceedingly extravagant; some even more extravagant than the one now under consideration. But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to relieve the Committee on the Public Lands from the odium implied in the statement that they have made a recommendation in favor of this project. They have not done so. I say this on behalf of the committee, because I think that such a recommendation would be discreditable to the committee. What individual members of the committee may have said to the paid lobbyists who have been here pressing this and other schemes to get possession of the island I cannot say. We have been bored by day and haunted by night by these exceedingly disinterested individuals, and to get rid of their importunities, it is impossible to say what members of the committee may have said to them; but this I do know, that as a committee, we are not committed to this project, and I trust never shall be. In the few moments accorded to me I am unable to discuss this measure in detail. I shall, however, attempt to give a few reasons why, in my judgment, this bill ought not to pass.

The Government of the United States owns to-day a small island in the bay of San Francisco, containing one hundred and twenty-nine acres, known as Yerba Buena, or Goat Island. This island has been reserved by the Government for military purposes. It lies in the center of the channel, commanding it on both sides. Until recently, no one deemed it possible that the Government would ever part with any portion of it, so important had it always been regarded for fortification purposes, to defend the entrance of the harbor, and for the protection of the city. But the enterprising managers of the Western Pacific railroad have conceived the idea that the island is just what they need for the terminus of the Pacific road. In the first place, they asked for the whole of it as a donation, but finding little favor for such a monstrous proposition, they with extreme modesty agree to accept a part of it now, expecting, of course, that the remainder will be surrendered to them whenever it is demanded. And, Mr. Speaker, I am free to say if this passes I do not think they will be disappointed in their expectation. Permit this corporation to locate their depot upon this island, and erect upon it the extensive structures which will be necessary to transact the business of this, the most important railroad in the world, give them this foothold now, and does any one believe they will ever be dispossessed? Once give the right of occupation and it is forever surrendered to them. When they have spent millions of dollars in bridging the channel to get on to the island, and perhaps millions more in the way of permanent structures, for the convenience of their immense traffic, does any one presume for a moment that the Government will dispossess them, and render valueless such vast expenditures of money? No, Mr. Speaker, if this island is to be preserved and retained by the Government for the purpose of defending the harbor and city of San Francisco it must be done now by defeating the bill under consideration. Allow it to pass, and for the purpose which the Government now holds it it is no longer of any value. The real question is are we prepared to give the island away? If we are, to whom shall we give it? Other roads terminating at San Francisco claim a portion of it. Shall we give this valuable island all to one mammoth corporation, as a monopoly, or divide it with other less favored but equally meritorious projects? In my judgment we should not give it away at all. If Congress determines that it is not needed for the defense of the harbor and the city, let us sell it, giving all parties a fair chance to compete for the purchase, and thereby realizing millions of dollars in the sale to the Government Treasury.

As at present advised I am decidedly opposed to either giving it away or selling it. We have learned something of the value of earth-works and fortifications upon the land in repelling naval attacks, even as against iron-clads and the most formidable guns ever floated on vessels-of-war. We have not forgotten the siege of Charleston and Mobile, when these fortifications on land resisted week after week, month after month, and almost year after year, the most formidable fleet of war vessels ever floated upon the waters. It is well that we should remember these practical illustrations of the value of earth-works and islands in our harbors for defensive purposes in time of war. It is too soon to forget the expensive lessons of the recent past. While we indulge the hope that our great Republic may be spared the calamity of either foreign or domestic war in the future we must not forget that it is the duty of all nations in time of peace to prepare for war. In looking over the thousands of miles of sea-coast, both on the Atlantic and Pacific, which we should be called upon to defend in case of foreign war against the attacks of powerful navies, does not ordinary prudence teach us that we should hold all the natural available points of defense we now possess?

San Francisco is one of the available points of attack. This city has already become one of the important cities of this country, and is destined at no distant day in the future to be one of the great cities of this continent. The completion of the Pacific railroad, now nearly done, gives to this city a commercial prominence which we cannot well overestimate and which we should not underrate. Her future is bright with hope, and in the fulfillment of the reasonable expectations of her people every American feels an honest pride. With a safe and commodious harbor, the terminus of a railroad connecting two great oceans, and stretching across a continent, controlling to a large extent the trade of the eastern world, that city is about to enter upon a career of prosperity hitherto unparalleled in the growth of American cities. The completion of the Pacific road will be an event of transcendent importance, not only to the city of San Francisco, but the entire Pacific slope, and indeed to our whole country. It will to a great extent revolutionize the commerce of the great countries of the East, with which we have heretofore enjoyed but very imperfect and comparatively unimportant commercial relations.

No man on this floor appreciates more keenly those advantages, and few are more liberal in extending such aid as is necessary to complete this great national thoroughfare. But believing that we are not called upon to make the concession demanded by this bill, and being convinced that the company asking the aid has all the land necessary for depot purposes at Oakland and in the city of San Francisco, and that the true interests of the country as well as the city will be better subserved by holding this island permanently for the purpose of fortifications, I cannot favor the passage of the bill. As I have before remarked, it commands the city of San Francisco and harbor in all directions, and would constitute a perfect point of defense for the harbor against a foreign attack. I have before me here a report from three of the most distinguished engineers in the service, and I desire to call the attention of the House to that report. These engineers of the United States recommend that this island be occupied for military purposes, and for such purposes only, and they protest against allowing the island to be given up for any such purposes as this bill contemplates. They state that if the structures proposed to be erected by this railroad company be built upon any portion of the island the Government will be prevented from ever rendering the island valuable for fortification purposes. This report is so important that I deem it proper to embody the whole of it as a part of my remarks. It is as follows:

Report by George H. Elliot, G. H. Mendell, and B. S. Alexander, Officers of Engineers, to General A. A. Humphreys, Chief of Engineers, of an examination of Yerba Buena Island, showing its importance as a military defense to the harbor of San Francisco.

OFFICE BOARD OF ENGINEERS,
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, January 8, 1868.

GENERAL: The board of engineers for the Pacific coast, constituted by Engineer Order No. 64, dated "Engineer Department, Washington, December 4, 1866," has received and considered the application of Mr. William B. Hyde, the chief engineer of the Terminal Central Pacific Railroad Company, dated October 28, 1867, and addressed to the Secretary of War, in relation to Yerba Buena Island.

The indorsement of the Department on this letter was as follows, namely:

"HEADQUARTERS CORPS OF ENGINEERS,
WASHINGTON, November 2, 1867.

"Respectfully referred to the board of engineers for the Pacific coast for report as to what portions of the island are required for defense.

"The general project of the defenses of the island should be considered by the board, so as to determine the traces and references of the crests of the batteries, and the ground that will be required by the military establishments of the island. There will then be indicated what may remain available for railroad and commercial purposes, and what restrictions the defensive uses exact in respect of them."

The board, having carefully examined the island and the adjacent channels, has the honor to submit the following report:

The great importance of Yerba Buena island, if occupied in time of war with heavy long-range guns, as securing the water front of the city of San Francisco from occupation by a hostile fleet, should such be found in the harbor on the declaration of war, or should it succeed in entering the bay either by force, by stratagem, by surprise, in a dense fog or in the darkness of night, has been acknowledged by all our engineers who have considered the subject.

The island will cover by its fire the entire water front of the present city of San Francisco, and it is the last point from which the anchorage in front of the city can be defended.

Remove this island and there will be nothing but a naval force to prevent an enemy's fleet, or even a single man-of-war, if the outer batteries should prove insufficient to prevent his entrance into the bay from taking position in front of the city, beyond effective range of Alcatraz Island, and either destroying it or levying such contributions as cupidity may dictate.

If the Government fails to properly occupy the island on the approach of war, or if it permits such structures to be erected along the water front of the island as will obstruct or otherwise nullify the fire of its batteries, the same result will follow.

Doubtless there are persons who attach more importance to this island for railroad and commercial uses than they do for military purposes, and those who are interested in securing it for purposes of private gain may argue that the defense of the city front may safely be left to the Navy alone unaided by land batteries.

As such a doctrine would render our Navy passive in time of war, confining it to home duty, and otherwise violate the well established principles of harbor defense, this board may safely leave its confutation, should it ever be publicly advanced, to the Department.

We start, therefore, with the idea that this island is absolutely necessary for the protection of the city front; that batteries should be erected upon it, and armed with our heaviest guns, which should control by their fire all the anchorages within range, from whence an enemy might injure the city or otherwise cripple its defense. We may add, too, that this island has a prospective value of great importance to the defense of the city.

It is the last point from which a defense can be made, and on account of its location and the ease with which it may be defended, it will be the most secure position in the harbor. It will probably, therefore, be occupied in time of war for ordnance purposes, have an arsenal, with all the necessary establishments for the storage and safe-keeping of artillery, ammunition, and small arms.

When the board first entered upon the investigation of this subject some of its members were disposed to think that all these things might be provided for; all necessary security given to the water front, and yet a portion of the northeastern end of the island and the adjacent shoal toward the northwest might be given up to commercial purposes. But as the investigation has proceeded this opinion has changed, and all the members of the board, now present, are of the opinion that no portion of the island or of the adjacent shoal should pass out of the control of the Government.

We proceed to give the reasons for this opinion.

The board first carefully examined the island, and came to the conclusion that it might be securely and cheaply fortified by a system of earthworks and batteries, the guns of which should fire en barbette. Having no good survey of the island, and no time to have one made before this report would be required, we next proceeded to compile a map from the best data which could be obtained in this city. The result was the sketch herewith inclosed, which is approximately correct, and upon which we have laid down, as near as may be, the positions, forms and sizes of the earthworks and batteries by which we propose to occupy the island.

We propose to build an inclosed earthwork (at A) on the highest point of the island, which will be the key of the position.

The crest of this fort will be held about in the reference of three hundred and twenty-five feet.

It is to command by its fire the two redoubts B and C, which it overlooks, and the batteries numbers four, five, six, and seven, rendering the occupation of these works by an enemy impossible.

Redoubt B will command, by its fire, batteries one, two, and three.

Redoubt C will have its crest about in the reference of one hundred and twenty-five feet, and will flank the only practicable landings on the island on the east and north sides, and command the channel between the island and the Contra Costa shore. The water batteries from No. 1 to No. 7 will be placed around the island, near the shore, in the most advantageous positions. Their crests will vary in height from about sixty feet to about two hundred feet. The lower of these batteries ought to be armed principally with smooth-bore guns, while the higher ones would receive mostly rifled guns and mortars. They will exclude an enemy from all anchorages within range of their guns.

The two redoubts A and B, being built to command the adjacent batteries, will be armed principally with smooth-bore field guns. They might, however, receive with advantage a few heavy sea-coast mortars, and perhaps some rifled guns of heavy caliber.

Redoubt C would be armed with ordnance suitable to accomplish the objects which have been indicated; that is to say, the two flanks looking toward the south and southwest with field guns, while the other three faces would receive heavy guns, (principally rifles.)

The most suitable position for the wharf is indicated on the sketch. It would be well sheltered from an enemy's guns until he had passed to the eastward of the island.

Such, in general terms, is the manner in which this board thinks the island should be fortified. Doubtless a complete survey of the ground will modify some of the details of the redoubts as well as of the batteries; but if this method of occupation should be adopted, the principles as herein sketched must remain unchanged.

We have now to examine into the consequences of giving up a portion of the island for railroad and commercial purposes; and,

1. We assume that no portion of the shore, from battery No. 1 on the western side of the island, around by the southern shore to battery No. 6, on the southeastern spur, could properly be occupied for railroad or commercial purposes; for such occupation involves the construction of wharves, buildings, and storehouses, which would mask the fire of the batteries, and render the service of their guns unsafe in time of action by reason of fire and splinters caused by the enemy's shot.

2. Neither could the cove between battery No. 6 and redoubt C be properly given up for civil objects; for here must be the wharf for the post, and the shores of this cove afford the most available and secure position on the island for barracks, storehouses, and other military establishments which will be required.

3. There remains, therefore, only the northern shore of the island and the adjacent shoal to be considered. The construction of buildings for civil purposes on this side of the island, though not so objectionable as the occupation of the southern, western, or eastern sides would be, might nevertheless materially endanger the safety of the city in time of war, and would probably prove to be a fruitful source of trouble in time of peace.

Let us suppose, for instance, that an enemy's fleet takes up a position on the eastern side of this shoal, from half a mile to a mile north of the eastern extremity of the island, and that this shoal is occupied by wharves, depots, workshops, storehouses, &c., covering it from the fire of the guns on the island. This position is within two and a half miles of the city front, and an enemy here, in a place of comparative security, and armed with the long-range guns of our times, would be in a condition to dictate terms to the city.

If this island were the only place for a railroad depot, or if a cession of a portion of it would add greatly to the prosperity of the city of San Francisco or was indispensable to its commercial prosperity, or even to its convenience, the board would feel disposed to enter into an investigation as to what portion of the shoal north of the island could safely be ceded for such purposes.

But the Contra Costa shore, eastward from the island, affords ample positions for all possible railroad or commercial purposes, the only objection being that the depot, wharves, &c., would be from one to two miles further from the city, and that their construction would be somewhat more expensive than they would be at Yerba Buena Island. These are objections, but they are not serious in their nature, and, in the opinion of the board, are far outweighed by endangering the safety of the city in time of war, as we have shown would be the case were Yerba Buena Island occupied by civil constructions.

This island is regarded in this city as a very valuable piece of property. If the public mind could be disabused of the idea that it may be obtained for railroad and commercial purposes by an act of Congress, and if the Government were disposed to sell the island, and were to put it up at auction to be sold to the highest bidder, it would probably bring $5,000,000.

This fact, together with the circumstance that several companies possessing ample means are endeavoring to get possession of the island without paying for it, and before it is wanted for either railroad or commercial uses, naturally leads to the suspicion that such parties are actuated more by the desire of private gain than by any public necessity connected with facilities for travel or commerce.

But there is another objection to giving up this island, or any portion of it, or of the shoal north of it, to railroad purposes. We allude to the bridging and ultimate closing of the channel between the island and the Contra Costa shore. If a railroad depot should be established on the island, the course of proceedings would probably be, first, to build a solid causeway from the Contra Costa shore out toward the island until a depth of water of about eighteen feet was reached, connecting this causeway with the island by a pile-bridge across the deeper water.

This construction would close only a small portion of the water-way between the island and the eastern shore, and would not probably do much damage except to fill up the flats in front of Oakland.

But the repairs of this bridge would be expensive and the draw would prove an annoyance and might at some time lead to an accident; it would doubtless induce the company owning the franchise to wish to make their causeway continuous, as is hinted in Mr. Hyde's letter of August 26, 1867, to General Alexander, a copy of which was forwarded to the Department, by direction of the board, on the 1st of October last. And the railroad company, once established on the island, by enlisting the sympathies or exciting the fears of the traveling community, would, in all probability, ultimately succeed in their object.

Such being the case, we are all called upon to investigate the effect of closing this channel by a permanent causeway.

The first step in this investigation was to calculate the area of the cross sections of the channels on either side of Yerba Buena Island, then to ascertain the velocity of the water in the two channels, and thus approximate to the quantity of water which passes through the two channels in a given unit of time.

Having done this, we next suppose the channel between the island and the Contra Costa shore to be closed by a causeway, and that all the water that formerly passed through it to pass through the other channel thus increasing the velocity in this channel. This velocity is already so great at certain states of the wind and tides, particularly close to the city front, where the surface velocity is sometimes four miles an hour, as to make it difficult for vessels to reach or leave their wharves, and any material increase of the current would increase the difficulty proportionably. Fortunately, the Coast Survey maps and current observations enable us to approximate to the increased velocity in the case supposed with some degree of exactness.

The following are the results:

Mean area of water-way between the city and Yerba Buena Island, 676,686 square feet; greatest surface velocity in mid-channel, 2.8 miles per hour; mean area of water-way between Yerba Buena Island and the Contra Costa shore, 238,396 square feet; greatest surface velocity in mid-channel, 1.9 per hour.

Now, if we leave out of consideration all disturbing causes, and suppose all the water in these cross sections to move with the surface velocities, we have for the channel between the city and Yerba Buena Island:

$676,686 \times 4 \times 1,066 = 2,778,926$ cubic feet as the discharge per second. And for the channel between Yerba Buena Island and the adjacent shore, $238,396 \times 2 \times 786 = 747,931$ cubic feet as the discharge per second.

Supposing the latter channel to be closed, and all the water to pass between the city and Yerba Buena Island, and that the same quantity passes through this channel in the same time as now passes in both channels, we have, by supposing the velocity to be proportional to the discharge, say three fourths of a mile per hour as the measured velocity.

Of course this is only an approximation. If we knew the velocity at different depths in the two channels the discharge of each would be much less than is given by the above figures. It is probable also that the ratio between the amount of water passing through the channels would be increased, giving as a consequence a decreased resulting velocity in the main channel when we suppose the other channel to be closed.

The fact, however, that this velocity would be considerably increased cannot be disputed, for the upper bay must still be filled and emptied at each tide, and we will thus have the same quantity of water passing through one channel in the same time that now passes through both channels, resulting of course either in an increased current or an increase of the water-way.

The rapid currents along the wharves of the city are already the cause of much difficulty, and if we suppose these wharves to be gradually extended out into the harbor, as has been the case in New York and Brooklyn, and further suppose that the encroachments on the water passage is also allowed to begin on the Yerba Buena shore, stopping up by one operation one third of the entire water-way, we have only to look at the difficulties that are sometimes experienced in the East river in front of New York to realize the future scene between the city of San Francisco and Yerba Buena Island.

Fortunately, the commerce of New York can seek, and has already sought to a great extent, the more quiet waters of the Hudson river, but the other side of the city of San Francisco has no such river flowing along its front.

The board will not now enter upon the other consequences that might follow the closing up of the channel under discussion, but will remark that in its opinion such a change might prove injurious, and should not be permitted without the most thorough investigation of the subject.

Recapitulation.

This board is of the opinion that no portion of Yerba Buena Island, or of the adjacent shoal, can safely be given up for railroad or commercial purposes.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

GEORGE H. ELLIOT,

Major of Engineers.

G. H. MENDELL,

Major Engineers, Brevet Colonel U. S. Army.

B. S. ALEXANDER,

Brevet Brigadier General U. S. A.,

President of Board of Engineers.

CHARLES W. RAYMOND,

Captain of Engineers, Recorder of Board.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no candid man who will read with care this able report of these competent engineers of the Army, who have no interest in this subject but the common interest of the country, and who have recently, under an order of the War Department, examined this island to ascertain its real value to the Government for military purposes, can favor the proposition under consideration.

But it is alleged by those who so persistently advocate this measure that the Government do not part with the title to any portion of this island, but hold the railroad corporation as a tenant at will to be removed in case of war if the Government requires it. I give the originators of this scheme the credit of so framing their bill as to ingeniously hide and cover their real object, and grant them that they gain by indirection what they could not hope to get by a more honorable and direct law; and I am really in doubt whether, if they can pass this bill in its present form, it is not better for the corporation than the original proposition, which gave them as a donation the entire island. Let us examine the bill for a moment and see if I am not right. It will be observed that the company obtain the right to locate the terminus of their road upon the island. They are permitted to erect their depots, warehouses, machine-shops, &c., at whatever cost they may deem necessary upon this Government reservation. Gaining no absolute title to the soil they acquire the rights and advantages of possession, and the title of the land remaining in the United States; all this vast property is not subject to taxation either for State, county, or city purposes. I wish to call the attention of the House to this feature of the bill, and in passing upon it let us determine whether we are not giving the corporation more substantial advantages than we should by an absolute grant of the land itself. May it not be presumed that this constitutes one of the strong reasons for the abandonment of the original project which contemplated a donation of the island as a free gift to this railroad corporation, now plethoric with Government subsidies and lands, to the exclusion of all other roads, and at a loss to the Government Treasury, as estimated by the board of engineers, of $5,000,000, which the island would bring if sold in the market?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say if the military authorities are correct in their estimate of the value of this island for military purposes we should not part with any portion of it at any price. But if Congress shall decide now, or at any time, otherwise, then I say it should be sold to the highest bidder or bidders, giving all who desire to purchase the whole, or any part of it, a fair chance in such manner and at such time as to realize the largest sum to the Government Treasury. Entertaining these views, I certainly hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. HIGBY. I will yield to the gentleman, but not for a motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker,

I do not think it is necessary to consume any further time on this bill, as I see that gentlemen of the House are determined not to pass it, or any bill like it. If I thought gentlemen intended to vote for this bill I would have read the full and elaborate report of three of the most eminent engineers of the Army on this subject, in which they state the Government has use for this island, and it cannot abandon it without exposing San Francisco to great risks. I have also a letter from the Secretary of War on this very subject, in which he corroborates the opinion of these engineers. But I see from the disposition of gentlemen around me that there is no necessity for having the report read.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HORTON] has stated the points, and stated them strongly. If gentlemen will look at the map they will see the situation of Goat Island. Here it is. What is proposed? This Western Pacific Railroad Company, this bloated corporation, swollen and plethoric with our subsidies, proposes to get possession of this island and it never can be deprived of its possession except, in the language of the bill, it may be suspended whenever the United States shall be engaged in war or in imminent danger thereof, and notice of such determination shall be given to said company, its successors or assigns, by the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President. You will see how that is hedged about with qualifications. You cannot get possession of it except under those conditions. If we let them go on as they have they will be so strong hereafter that we will never get back the possession of it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Cannot the Government take possession of any property in time of war?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to call attention to another point. They are to build a causeway or bridge from the main shore to this island, but there is no provision that the Government, which owns the land, and which may need it for military defense, and may therefore establish military depots there, shall have the use of this causeway or bridge. While this Government is to give this company a portion of this island for nothing, there is no provision in this bill that the Government can ever get on or off the island except upon such terms as the company may choose to impose, without the payment of such price as the company may fix. Various sums have been stated as the value of the island. Some say one million and some say five or six. Mr. Carpenter, of California, a gentleman who is well known, has telegraphed that he will give $1,000,000 for this island; that he will give $1,000,000 in gold and put the money here in twenty days. And yet, sir, it is now proposed to give this island away against the protest of our military officers, against the protest of our engineers, and against the protest of the Secretary of War, and in the face of an offer of $1,000,000 for it.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the gentleman from California to yield to me.

Mr. HIGBY. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. Speaker, at my entrance to this body, I believe there was no project in the United States that received more cordial indorsement of men of all parties than the Pacific railroad; and it was deemed a matter of so much national importance that for years, in fact from 1860 down to the present time, the Pacific railroad has been made a part of the national platform of both parties. Yet, sir, during this winter I have hardly heard a word of kindness from anybody for a company that has to-day thirty thousand men working upon the road, and which promises to build it fifteen years earlier than the most sanguine ever expected to see it done.

I have read the report to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has referred, and I say that report presents the strongest argument in favor of this very bill. The gentleman talks about the island being worth $6,000,000. I do not care how many millions it is worth. But that report shows that the island should be reserved by the Government for military purposes. It is of no value except for military purposes. The Government can never sell it for commercial purposes. The question then arises whether in the long interval between one war and another this Government shall stand like a hog on the ice and say that this island, valuable as it is for commercial purposes by connection with the railroad, shall not be used for such purposes, because perchance once in half a century the Government may need it for war purposes.

Then the bill further provides that in case of war the Secretary of War can take possession of the island, and not only that but of the track, depots, and warehouses without paying one cent. If this island is worth anything, then, in case the Government wants a railroad track leading to it for the purpose of carrying munitions and supplies, it will cost, I understand, $1,500,000 to connect the island with the main land. Now, the Government will have the full advantage of this outlay in case it is allowed to be made.

The gentleman from Illinois says it is only in case of war that the Government can resume possession of the island on a declaration by the Secretary of War that it is wanted. This bill provides that the grant may be terminated at any time by act of Congress. Not only may possession be resumed in the event of war, but the grant may be terminated by act of Congress.

This island is the natural terminus, as everybody will see, of this Pacific railroad. It gives it a water front, where without interfering with anybody the freights may be landed from the Pacific steamers from China and the East, and loaded into the cars. It will save an immense amount of cartage through the city of San Francisco, as everybody must know.

Now, sir, there is no guard that can be put in any bill that is not put in this. It gives a mere temporary right of occupation at the will of Congress. But gentlemen say to me that this granting of a mere right of possession is an entering wedge for the disposal of the title to the land by some future Congress. They assume that the virtue of this Congress is greater than that of succeeding Congresses. I take it the virtue which refuses in this Congress to give away the title will refuse to give it hereafter. The company must take simply a possessory right under this bill.

Some gentlemen are accustomed to speak of the Pacific railroad as a monstrous corporation, and as if it was to be hewn down before it had completed its work. I do not look upon this corporation in that light. It is one of the greatest railroad enterprises the world has ever seen, and instead of undertaking to shackle it when the day is drawing near for its completion I say give to it all the advantages that can be given consistent with the rights of the Government and of the people.

Mr. HIGBY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I have but a very few words to say about this bill. In the first place, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, I desire to put them right before the House. They have not formally considered this bill. There were several propositions for the possession of this island, one from a local road asking the privilege of removing a portion of the earth from the island and filling in the surrounding limits, so as to get a sufficient depth of water. The committee have had propositions from various quarters before them for the possession in some form of this island. Among the rest a proposition came up to give a portion of it under the provisions of this bill to the Union Pacific railroad. Now, sir, I have simply to say this: that without a full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances that have been referred to this morning, especially the one in reference to $1,000,000 being offered for this island, I had thought possibly it was right we should consider this question in the committee, as this island seems to be the natural terminus for the road, communicating between the two oceans. But, sir, I think from the temper of the House that they hardly feel disposed to pass it. I hope the gentleman will allow it to go to the committee to be reported on at the next session, when more of the facts can be ascertained. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HIGBY. I yield now for five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. AXTELL.]

Mr. AXTELL. I desire to say a few words in relation to the harbor of San Francisco. I am very glad that gentlemen have our charts here. They will observe that we have six miles of straight line upon which our principal ports are located. Fortifications are now being built at Fort Point and Lime Point, and another nearer the city at Black Point. And then in the very throat of the harbor there is Fort Alcatraz, and to the right of it a large island called Angel Island, occupied by the Government and fortified. This island is inside the harbor, and, as the engineer remarks, would only be useful in case a fleet should get into the harbor. It commands the city front. I call attention to the significant fact that for twenty years the Government have been interested in that harbor and have been munificent and more than liberal to us, not only in forts but in iron-clads for its protection, and yet they have never put up a single gun on this island, nor thought it necessary to use or occupy it for military purposes.

I desire to call attention to the further fact that the island has been occupied by squatters up to a few years ago, when General McDowell took possession of it and condemned it under some old reservation act for the use of fortifications for the Government. I am not very conversant with this character of law, but I should suppose that if condemned for military use it would not properly be Government land for sale. If the Government does not need it for military purposes it will fall back to the original squatters. The island contains one hundred and fourteen acres. It is a high, rocky point, and there is a very small portion of it that people can inhabit at all. It is proposed to cut it down and level it, leaving enough for the Government to occupy for all purposes of fortification, and allowing its present use by the railroad, who will build a road from the opposite side of the bay across the water—shoal water—without injuring the harbor, and coming on to the island within perhaps a mile of the city front at the north point. I wish the bill could be amended so as to include all railroads. I am not speaking in the interest of the railroads, but in the interest of the cities of San Francisco and Oakland, and the country lying back of them. Gentlemen who look at the chart will see that our bay stretches down beyond this point fifty miles, and this will save nearly a hundred miles in coming to San Francisco from the East.

Mr. HIGBY. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] desires to offer an amendment. I will hear it read.

Mr. DELANO. I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the merits of the bill, but I desire to offer the following amendment:

Provided further, That the United States reserves to itself the right to grant to any other railroad companies the same and similar privileges as are hereby granted to the Western Pacific Railroad Company of California, but in making such grants no rights shall be conferred upon any other company which will impair the rights herein conferred upon said Western Pacific Railroad Company, and this act shall not be so construed as to give the said company the right to use and occupy any portion of said island not necessary for the business of its road.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to allow it to be offered?

Mr. HIGBY. I do.

The SPEAKER. Then it is pending.

Mr. HIGBY. I do. I will simply say that it is but an explanation of what I understand the bill to be now. And if it will give any satisfaction to other members of the House I certainly have no objection to it. I now yield for five minutes to my colleague near me, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no fight to make against the Western Pacific railroad or any other great enterprise that is for the benefit of the people, as I admit that road to be. But I think it is my duty as a Representative from the State of California to say something in vindication of private rights.

Early this session I presented a memorial, and had it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, asking that committee to investigate the claim of a man who has lived on this island for seventeen years, and who purchased from a man who had lived on the island for fifteen years before him. I asked the Judiciary Committee to examine and report to this House what title that man has, and how it was that the Government of the United States could deprive him of his property without any compensation for it.

I have in my desk here papers in relation to all the Government reservations on the Pacific coast. The record in this case shows that Millard Fillmore, when President of the United States, ordered this island to be set apart as a military reservation. But no notice was given to the occupants of the island, and no steps were taken until last year to perfect the claim of the United States to this island for a reservation. Last year the occupants of the island were ejected by an order from the War Department to General McDowell to take possession of it, which he did. Whether that possession gives a title or not I refer gentlemen to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, where they will find the question fairly and squarely decided, in cases which I cited to the House in some remarks I submitted not long since upon the Yosemite bill.

This island is within the limits of San Francisco. In 1855 the city of San Francisco passed an ordinance giving to the actual settlers and occupants a title to the lands held within the city limits. To make it sure they went to the State Legislature and had their ordinance affirmed by a statute of the Legislature. And to make it still more conclusive they came to Congress in 1864, and the House of Representatives, with only eleven opposing votes, affirmed the whole transaction, the ordinance of the city of San Francisco, and the act of the Legislature of the State, declaring that every man holding by that tenure within the limits of San Francisco should be confirmed in his title. There are men in this city, I understand, who have bought from the man who has lived on this island for seventeen years his interest for a large sum of money, many thousand dollars; and I say their rights should be protected.

I now want to say a few words as to the general policy of this bill. If this island does belong to the Government of the United States, if it has been taken and set apart for military purposes, there should be some provision for paying the true owners of this island for their property. Even if that is not done now, I say the question should at least be investigated.

The island lies in the middle of the bay of San Francisco. How is it to be reached and occupied by this railroad company? Certainly by a bridge connecting it with the main land. Now, if such a bridge will interfere with the commerce there, it certainly should never be allowed to be built. I want to have this bill referred to some appropriate committee, so that we may have a report from some board of competent officers, whose duty it shall be to examine and report whether such a structure will interfere with the commerce of our great city. If they shall report that it will not so interfere, then I shall be in favor of giving this privilege to this railroad company, for I want it brought as near to the city of San Francisco as possible; and I pledge myself in advance that when a board of officers of engineers have made this survey, and have reported to this House or to the department that this structure will not interfere with the commerce of San Francisco, and the Committee on the Judiciary have reported that private parties have no rights on this island, I will vote to give enough of it to this railroad for depot purposes.

Gentlemen who have advocated giving this island to this railroad company for depot purposes say that the trade with China and with Japan is going to swell our commerce, and that it will center upon that island. No man ought to stand on this floor and say that the city front of San Francisco should be broken up by transferring the business of the merchants into the middle of the bay. I say it is outrageous to break up the business of the merchants of that city, who would make our commerce respectable all over the world, and transfer that business into the middle of the bay, to be there under the control of a soulless corporation. It is an indignity upon the people of San Francisco to bring forward such a proposition.

I hope this bill will be allowed to go to a committee; and if proper restrictions should hereafter be put upon it I will give it my hearty and cordial support. I hold in my hand a report on this subject made by the engineers appointed by the War Department, who say that this island is worth $5,000,000. I have also another report from General Humphreys, of similar purport. But what I principally desire is that the bill shall embrace proper restrictions, so that the business of San Francisco may not be taken from the city front and transferred to this island, where it will be under the control of speculators, who will break up our merchants and destroy our commerce.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, I have no more personal or private interest in regard to this matter than any other member of this House. The only question is, where is the commercial point on the bay of San Francisco? for it is there that this railroad should terminate. I am satisfied that this question will, in time, be settled by the laws of trade; and any company or companies that may run a railroad from the main land to Yerba Buena Island must take the risks as to whether that or some other point shall be demonstrated by the laws of trade to be the proper terminus.

Now, sir, I wish to submit a few facts. In the first place this bill comes to the Speaker's table from the Senate, and there is a manifest disposition on the part of some members to refer it to some one of the committees of this House. The struggle at present seems to be to refer it to the Committee on the Public Lands; but I presume that if it should be so referred there would be a struggle on the part of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to obtain the custody of the bill, for I believe that the formation of the railroad affected by this bill gave rise to the Committees on the Pacific Railroad in both ends of the Capitol; and those committees have at all times had supervision of all questions pertaining to this railroad.

But, sir, I have not been tenacious to assert the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad with regard to this bill. I have called upon the Committee on the Public Lands to examine this bill as it lay upon the Speaker's table, knowing that, should it be referred, there would not be time to act on it at this session. I have understood that a majority of that committee have examined the bill and are in favor of its passage without a formal reference to the committee. I conferred with the chairman of the committee, [Mr. JULIAN,] who, before he left the city, examined the bill and told me that he desired to have it passed, and wished me to use my influence in its behalf whenever it should come up.

I have conferred very little with members generally in reference to this question, and I do not know the temper of the House. But I have no authority to consent to the reference of the bill. I do not act in this matter as the organ of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, because the bill has never been referred to that committee. It was favorably reported in the Senate by the Pacific Railroad Committee of that body after a thorough examination, a very large majority of the committee concurring in the report. I believe that the question as to private rights, which has been suggested by one of my colleagues, was very thoroughly examined by the Senate committee, who came very decidedly to the conclusion that no private rights would be injuriously affected by the measure. The last proviso of the bill shows that Congress does not attempt to convey any private rights whatever, but all rights of individuals are expressly reserved and protected. I ask that the last proviso be read. I do not mean the amendment, but the last proviso of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, This act shall not impair the rights or claims of persons in possession of the land of Yerba Buena at the time of the late military occupation thereof.

Mr. RAUM. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer an amendment and to make an explanation.

Mr. HIGBY. I will yield to the gentleman for three minutes, but not to offer an amendment.

Mr. RAUM. I will read the amendment I propose to offer as a part of my remarks and make some observations on it. It is as follows:

Provided, That the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or either of them, shall have the right to join the said Western Pacific Railroad Company in the occupation of said island under this act with all the rights, powers, and privileges of the Western Pacific Railroad Company.

If this bill is to pass I presume that proviso should be added to it. This proposes to grant to a short line of railroad, not more than fifty or sixty miles long, said to be the western terminus of this road, this island worth three or four times the value of the road you grant it to. It is said it is the terminus of the Pacific railroad. That is true, but it is an independent railroad company. You grant this island to the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and you give them the monopoly of the whole trade to and from the Pacific ocean over the Union and Central Pacific railroads.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. RAUM. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HIGBY. I object to that.

Mr. RAUM. It does seem to me if this bill passes these roads should participate in its benefits.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Throw it open so all these railroads may compete for the purchase of this island.

Mr. JUDD. I ask the gentleman from California to yield to me for a question.

Mr. HIGBY. Certainly.

Mr. JUDD. I ask the gentleman whether there is not in the middle of this bill a grant for a new railroad? How long is it to be and what subsidies are to be granted to it?

Mr. HIGBY. None.

Mr. JUDD. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to this clause of the bill:

The said Western Pacific Railroad Company are also hereby authorized to locate and construct a railroad thence, by the shortest and most practicable route, to a point on its present line at or south of the city of Stockton, and they are hereby enfranchised with all the grants, privileges, and benefits, and made subject to all the conditions of the several acts of Congress relating to the said company and its railroad and telegraph line.

I desire the gentleman to advise me whether that is not a railroad grant in the body of the bill?

Mr. HIGBY. It is a grant, but without subsidies or bonds.

Mr. JUDD. Does it give them land?

Mr. HIGBY. It gives them land wherever they turn off.

Mr. JUDD. How long is it—one hundred and sixty miles?

Mr. HIGBY. It is not so much.

Mr. JUDD. How much?

Mr. HIGBY. About seventy.

Mr. JUDD. A gentleman told me it was one hundred and sixty.

Mr. HIGBY. It is only one hundred and thirty by water. You have to go forty miles and then at right angles to make one hundred and thirty. The diversion is not to be a great way from the city of Oakland. They have to pass through a range of mountains, and there is but one pass I know of, that is to go to the city of San José. To get from the city of Oakland to this island there is a distance of over two miles by water to be overcome. A portion of that water channel around the ease side is about twenty-five feet deep; the rest of the water varies in depth from two fathoms to three or four feet. The gentleman says there is a proposition to give a million or more dollars for the island. Let me say to the House that the island lies right in front of the city of San Francisco, at a distance of less than a mile and a half; the population has been twenty years growing to its present dimension, and yet this is the first time we have heard a proposition that anybody would give the Government a considerable sum of money for it. I undertake to say there is not a man in California that would give $10,000 for it, except it might be for speculative purposes, believing that he could dispose of it to some railroad company for a landing, and make a large amount of profit in that way.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. HIGBY. I cannot yield to allow amendment to be offered cutting off all discussion.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will you not allow it to be read?

Mr. HIGBY. No, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, we will vote your bill down, then.

Mr. HIGBY. Well, sir; you may do it. I have heard such threats before.

Let us see how much value there is in this island. It contains about one hundred and fifteen acres. From the water base the land rises to a height of three hundred feet. Now, in order to get a deep water front considerable work has to be done. At a little distance the water is one hundred feet deep, and it increases to a depth of three hundred feet. Now, I ask how many millions of dollars it will take to cut down all that island so as to render it all useful, provided it is not to be occupied at all by the Government for military purposes. You may think the island is of great value. I admit if it was only a few feet above the water level it would be of vast value compared with what it is now.

We are told it is to be kept for military purposes. So we insist it should be if it is necessary, although it has never yet been used for such purposes. It would be a woful moment for San Francisco when any foreign Power sends its navy past Fort Alcatraz and Black Point. I should despair of the preservation of that city in such an event. I question whether that island could furnish fortifications to save that city, although prudence would dictate its reservation for military purposes in the possible event of its being needed. I would not have the Government release its hold on the island, nor is it designed by this bill that it should do so.

It is a question in my mind whether this company gets enough to warrant it in commencing this immense expenditure year after year on that island for the use it will make of it. One gentleman says it can only be resumed by the Government in time of war. This bill provides that Congress may at any time repeal this act, and whenever it shall do so, or whenever the Government shall see its need of the island for military purposes it may take it away from this company and the company will get nothing for it. All the improvements made by the company will go for naught in that event.

It seems to me this bill is properly guarded, as much so as it possibly could be. I think it is an utter impossibility to put any more guards around it so as to protect the rights of private individuals and protect the Government, also, whenever it may be deemed necessary to resume possession of the island.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to call his attention to one of the provisions of this bill. I find among other provisions of the bill, which seems to have been carefully drawn, this:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize or grant any subsidy in bonds for any of the roads built under this act.

It built forty miles, I understand, for what would be about seventy.

Mr. HIGBY. It does not have to build that distance. It will save forty-five miles in going round the bay. I have answered the gentleman's question and cannot yield further to him. I desire to say a word in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RAUM,] who wished to offer an amendment, that the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific, and the Western Pacific are lines that unite each with the other, and make one continuous line to San Francisco.

Mr. RAUM. I will state the object I had.

Mr. HIGBY. I cannot yield. The Central Pacific railroad will not reach the water; neither will the Union Pacific railroad. There is only the Western Pacific railroad. If there shall ever be any act of Congress allowing other railroads to go to this point, I think we have guarded the bill well enough for them so that if they wish to have depots there they can have them. It is for commercial purposes that we are in favor of keeping this open and using it for railroad purposes, not only by this one road, but by others, if military necessity does not compel the Government to use it all for military purposes. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] provides for that, and that was why I readily permitted him to offer it. It is simply an explanation of what I understand to be the tenor of the bill, its purpose and object and nothing else. When I was in San Francisco parties came to me and wanted to get my influence to help them to the island. I told them I thought it was a commercial point, and that I thought it ought to be opened to railroads; not only to one railroad, but to all railroads that could possibly get there from all parts of the State. The object of the bill is to leave it open in that way. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The question was put on seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 49, noes 48; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOPKINS and HIGBY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 61.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOPKINS moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I should like very much to ascertain what the disposition of the House is as to a recess. I believe it is pretty certain from indications which have been given that we shall have no quorum on Monday, and we ought therefore to go on and do all we can or that is needful to be done to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is there?

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a great deal of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like the gentleman to tell us some of the things which are needed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I must call for the regular order. There are one or two bills on the Speaker's table which the Committee on the Territories have instructed me to move to put upon their passage.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House take a recess until ten o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend that motion by striking out "ten o'clock on Monday morning" and inserting "half past seven o'clock this evening."

The question was put on the amendment; and there were—ayes 74, noes 53.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion as amended; and being taken, there were, upon a division—ayes 72, noes 52.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 16, noes 85.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of those voting) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to; and accordingly, (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.,) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The hour of half past seven o'clock p. m. having arrived the House resumed its session.

DUTY ON COPPER.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill, which was read, provides that from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the articles herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following specified duties and rates of duty: on all copper imported in the form of ores, three cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all regulus of copper, and on all black or coarse copper, four cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all old copper, fit only for manufacture, four cents per pound; on all copper in plates, bars, ingots, pigs, and in other forms not manufactured or herein enumerated, five cents per pound.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time?

Mr. THOMAS. I have been very earnestly urged to resist this measure. I know that one of my colleagues [Mr. PHELPS] has prepared himself very fully on this particular subject. I should certainly be very derelict to my duty to him if I did not take every precaution against action upon this bill in his absence. It is upon that ground that I must object to the introduction of this bill at this time; and if it is introduced I must insist upon the enforcement of the rule, which requires that such a bill shall receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman withdraw his objection until I state briefly the motives of the Committee of Ways and Means in proposing to introduce this bill at this time?

Mr. THOMAS. It would be a work of supererogation on the part of the gentleman, for I should still insist upon my objection to the consideration of the bill in the absence of my colleague, who is not now in his seat.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not now before the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States; and

An act (H. R. No. 1021) in amendment of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States."

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. PAINE. I am informed that I have been appointed upon the conference committee upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill for the removal of political disabilities from Simeon Corley and others. On account of the inconvenience of my moving about I ask to be excused from service on that committee.

No objection was made; and Mr. PAINE was excused, and Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, appointed to serve in his place.

INDEXING THE TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, a bill (H. R. No. 1457) to pay for indexing the tax bill; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay out of the contingent fund of the House $100 to the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means for preparing, by order of the House, a full index of the act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes, approved July 20, 1868.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will state that this duty was imposed upon the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means by a resolution reported from the Committee on Printing, and it was not a part of his regular duties. He was busily engaged for seven nights in preparing this index, his time during the day being occupied upon business for the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMERCE, ETC., IN ALASKA.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the House, by unanimous consent, take from the Speaker's table for consideration at the present time the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Before the House proceeds to the consideration of this bill, I have consented to yield to several other gentlemen for the transaction of business in which they feel an interest.

TERRITORIAL ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. MULLINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1458) to provide for the more economical administration of the government of the several Territories of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that from and after its passage the Legislatures of the several Territories of the United States shall meet but once in every two years; and the next meeting of those Legislatures is to take place two years from the date of their last sessions respectively. No money is to be appropriated from the Treasury of the United States to pay the legislative expenses of Territories for any other than biennial sessions. The salary of the Governors of the Territories is fixed at $2,500 per annum.

Mr. MULLINS. I do not care to take up the time of the House in discussing this question. The measure is one which must address itself to the good sense of every member.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Substantially this same proposition was embraced in one of our appropriation bills, and was so worded as to take effect from and after the 1st day of the present month, it being supposed that the bill would become a law before the 1st of July.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MULLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FLOATING DEBT OF WASHINGTON.

On motion of Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, and by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 637) to authorize the city of Washington to issue bonds for the purpose of paying the floating debt of the city was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The first section of the bill authorizes the city of Washington to issue, by vote of its councils, registered or coupon bonds in denominations of $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, payable in ten years from the date of issue, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, principal and interest payable in lawful money of the United States. The bonds are to be signed by the mayor and countersigned by the register of the city, and are to be payable at such place or places as may by them be deemed expedient, and may be issued and disposed of to an amount sufficient to pay and discharge the present floating debt of the city, not, however, to exceed the sum of $800,000. The bonds are not to be sold for less than their par value in lawful money of the United States, or in exchange for the matured and liquidated indebtedness; and no greater amount of the bonds is to be disposed of than may be found necessary for the payment of such indebtedness. The second section makes it the duty of the city councils upon issuing the bonds to provide by taxation for the prompt payment of the interest thereon; also to provide for the redemption of the bonds by establishing a sinking fund to be set apart annually to an amount not exceeding ten per cent. of the amount of bonds issued, this sinking fund to be created from regular taxes levied for that purpose, and to be assessed and collected as other taxes. The third section authorizes the city councils to pass any and all ordinances which may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are repealed.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF THE RULES.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of the House, to be in readiness at the next session, the usual edition of the Constitution, Rules, and Manual, together with Barclay's Digest, with such additions as have been made during the present session, and upon the same terms as heretofore.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. HOPKINS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 1276, for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation, in Arkansas, with amendments.

The bill was read. The preamble recites that the public reservation known as the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas, is now held and occupied without color of title by various persons, whose claims have never been acknowledged by the United States Government; and that the public interest and humanity require that they should be made available for public use, and that the welfare and settlement of the State will be promoted by the sale of lands adjacent thereto. The first section provides that upon the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be surveyed, platted, and laid out into streets, blocks, and lots, or parcels of ground of such form and area as will best facilitate the construction of a town, all that portion of the public domain situate in sections twenty-eight, twenty-nine, thirty-two, thirty-three, thirty-four, and thirty-five, in township two and three south, of range nineteen west, known as the Hot Springs reservation, in Hot Springs county, State of Arkansas; provided that no parcel of ground surveyed and platted for lot, block, or street shall approach nearer than one hundred feet to any spring included in the group of hot or warm springs embraced within the reservation. When the survey shall have been made in accordance with the provisions herein provided the Secretary of the Interior shall cause maps and plats to be made of said survey and the grounds embraced within this reservation, which maps and plats shall show each lot, block, and street of the survey, each stream of water, and the elevation of each block of ground above some fixed point to be designated on a level with the drainage of this reservation, each spring and its elevation above the point designated, also the temperature of each spring; and shall furnish these maps and plats to persons who may apply for information. The second section provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall, within sixty days after this reservation is surveyed and platted, as above provided, appoint three disinterested freeholders, not citizens of Arkansas, who shall proceed to the reservation, and on view thereof appraise the lots or parcels of ground so platted and surveyed, each at the cash value thereof, and return the same to the Secretary of the Interior. These appraisers shall also receive proof of claims of loyal persons, if any such are presented, which were acquired prior to the 1st of April, 1861, as well as proof of the loyalty of persons presenting such claims, and return the same to the Secretary of the Interior for his action thereon. The third section provides that after such surveys have been made, plats and maps prepared, and report of appraisers returned as provided, the Secretary of the Interior shall advertise in all the newspapers authorized to publish the laws of the United States in the several States, once each week for the period of ninety days, that upon a day to be designated in the advertisement, which shall be immediately succeeding the expiration of the period above named, the proper officers will sell, upon the reservation at public auction, to the highest and best bidder, all those lots or parcels of ground situated nearest to a point in such survey, to be ascertained which shall be the center of the group of springs aforesaid, and shall be marked and designated upon the maps and plats of the survey, which will be required to make one fourth of the area of said reservation. Upon the day designated in the advertisement the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the sale to be made as provided in accordance with existing laws, made and provided for the sale of public lands; provided that no lot or parcel of ground shall be sold for less than its appraised value; provided that no lot or parcel of this reservation shall be sold, to which, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, a legal claim exists, belonging to any person or persons who remained loyal to the Government of the United States during the late war, and who did not, directly or indirectly, give aid, countenance, or assistance in any way to those in rebellion, or to their authority, which was acquired prior to the 1st of April, 1861, until such claim shall have been set aside by the proper authorities; provided also that no lot, block, or parcel of ground, containing a spring of the character described as aforesaid in section one, shall be sold or offered for sale; but by virtue of this act, each spring of the character designated as hot, warm, or mineral springs within this reservation, with a plat of ground embracing an area which shall extend one hundred feet in all directions from its center, shall become the property of the municipality so soon as organized and legally authorized to hold property, and shall so remain forever, the right to convey not being granted. It shall also be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to have surveyed and set apart a plat of ground, not to exceed one hundred acres in area, upon what is known as Hot Springs mountain, for a public park, which may be excepted from the survey into lots, blocks, and streets, the title of which shall vest in like manner as the title of the springs hereinbefore provided. The fourth section provides that the proceeds of the sale provided for in the foregoing sections shall be returned to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall first pay all costs of survey, appraisal, and sale; after which he shall invest the residue in United States securities, and hold it in trust until otherwise directed by law. The fifth section provides that the interest accruing upon such securities shall be applied pro rata for the education of children in the State of Arkansas, without respect to color, which may be between the ages of six and twenty years. The sixth section provides that the remaining three fourths of the aforesaid reservation shall be sold, one fourth annually, upon a day designated in each year by the Secretary of the Interior; such sales to be made in like manner as hereinbefore provided, the lots to be first sold in each case being those next adjacent to those last sold; provided that the lots or parcels of land sold each year shall have a separate appraisal in like manner as hereinbefore provided, which appraisal shall be made during the sixty days next preceding the ninety days which such lands in each case shall be advertised prior to sale. The seventh and last section provides the proceeds of each annual sale, as aforesaid, shall be subject to the same provisions as are made and provided in section four and section five of this act for the proceeds of the first sale of one fourth of the reservation as aforesaid.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to, as follows:

Strike out all of section two, after the word "Interior," in line eight, and insert as follows: "and any person who may be residing upon said reservation at the time of the passage of this act shall be entitled to take the lot or lots upon which his or her residence is actually located by paying therefor the appraised value thereof: Provided, however, That in ascertaining such value the appraisers shall estimate the value of said lots and shall not take into account the value of the improvements thereon: And provided further, That if said occupant does not desire to take said lot or lots he or she shall be permitted to remove the improvements thereon."

Strike out that part of section three, between the word "value," in line twenty, and the word "provided," in line thirty.

Strike out in lines thirty-five and thirty-six, in section three, the words "embracing an area which shall extend one hundred feet in all directions from its center" and insert as follows: "two hundred feet square, the spring being as nearly as practicable in the center thereof."

Strike out in line thirty-nine, section three, the words "it shall also be lawful for."

Strike out in line forty, section three, the word "to" and insert the word "shall."

In line three, section five, between the words "of" and "children," insert the words "all the."

In lines three and four, in section five, strike out the words "without respect to color."

Insert after the word "Interior," in line four, section six, the words "public notice thereof being given in the manner provided in section three."

Strike out in lines ten and eleven, section six, the words "ninety days which said lands in each case shall be advertised prior to sale" and insert the words "said sale."

Strike out from the word "sale," in the thirty-second line, to and including the word "granted," in the thirty-ninth line, section three, and insert as follows: "but said lot, block, or parcel of ground shall for ever remain the property of the United States, subject to the control and authority of the Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it shall be to protect the said property from the occupation of any person or persons whatever and keep it at all times open and free to the use of the public; and the said Secretary of the Interior shall report annually to Congress the situation of the said lot, block, or parcel of ground, and what legislation may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act."

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the public sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas. It comprises four sections located about fifty miles southwesterly from Little Rock, along the western slope of the Hot Springs mountain, being a margin of the Ozark group, and a portion of the lands ceded to the United States by the Qua-Paw Indians in 1818.

The act reserving the same was passed on the 20th of April, 1832, which, after making reservation of certain salt springs in Arkansas, proceeds as follows, (4 Statutes-at-Large, page 505:)

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Hot Springs in said Territory, together with four sections of land, including said springs, as near the center thereof as may be, shall be reserved for the future disposal of the United States, and shall not be entered, located, or appropriated, for any other purpose whatever."

It is reasonable to suppose, then, that at the time of the passage of this act Congress understood the land upon which the Hot Springs are located to be unappropriated public domain; that it had neither been patented, preempted, or located by any person or persons whatever. We do not contend that the act of 1832 was retroactive and was intended to cut off all who had valid claims anterior to its passage; in other words, that it could undo that which had been lawfully done. But we do contend that Rector, Langlais, Beldin, or anybody else, in order to be entitled to a patent must make proof of an appropriation of the Hot Springs anterior to their reservation by the United States. And, further, that no one has ever before or since set up any valid claim to the same.

The springs are fifty-four in number, having a temperature varying from 98° to 150° Fahrenheit, and discharge three hundred and seventeen gallons of water per minute. The amount discharged by each varies, but they are all qualitatively allied.

The following is a chemical analysis of the properties of those waters: Silicates with base, bicarbonate of lime, bicarbonate of magnesia, alumina with oxide of iron, arseniate of iron, carbonate of soda, carbonate of potash, carbonate of lithia, sulphate of magnesia, chloride of magnesia, oxide of manganese, sulphate of lime, arseniate of lime, bromine, iodine a trace, organic matter a trace.

These springs are the most remarkable in the world. The power their waters have to cure all chronic diseases is indeed wonderful.

Dr. Lawrence, a resident physician for ten years, says:

"The properties of the waters depend not alone upon the caloric, diluent, solvent, corrective, or the antacid qualities—but the springs all contain carbonates of the alkalis and alkaline earths—agents well known to therapeutists to possess active eliminative agency; consequently they produce valuable alterative effects in chronic diseases. Again, the natural soluble silicates of the earths, I feel satisfied by experience, produce molecular results, as yet but little known or regarded by the profession as adjuncts in the treatment of constitutional diseases.

Rheumatism, gout, stiff joints, contractions of the muscles and skin, old wounds, and painful cicatrices are relieved. Skin diseases, scrofulous ulcerations, and enlargement of the glands; prostrations from long-standing sickness, or from debility following severe courses of powerful medicines, show a remarkable improvement. Spinal diseases, neuralgias, nervous affections, partial paralysis, lead palsy, St. Vitus' dance, (chorea,) muscular and general debility, respond to treatment. Uterine diseases as a class are greatly benefited, and the uterus particularly regarded for the grand climacteric change of life. Where sterility is a consequent of functional disorder, the baths are of great importance. For mercurial diseases, mercurio-syphilitic, and all syphilitic forms of derangement, volumes of testimonials could be adduced relative to the effects of these remarkable and unexcelled waters in the treatment of those obstinate and loathsome affections.

Experience, with careful observations for a number of years, satisfy me that dropsies, cancers, aneurisms, acute inflammatory diseases, diseases of the lungs, bronchial tubes, tuberculosis in any form, affections of the heart or brain are not benefited here; but, on the contrary, the Hot Springs are positively injurious."

It is estimated by eminent medical gentlemen that there are over one hundred thousand afflicted persons in the United States who cannot be permanently cured except by a use of these waters.

It is proper to say that various persons have from time to time laid claim to portions of this reservation under the following acts: April 12, 1814, page 121, and act of February 17, 1815, page 211, volume three, United States Statutes; act of May 29, 1830, page 429, and of July 14, 1832, page 603, volume four; and act of March 1, 1843, page 603, volume five, United States Statutes. No one of these claimants have ever been recognized by any Department of the Government.

The several claimants to the Hot Springs, whose conflicting claims have been urged from time to time are:

1. The claim of Rector, assignee of Langlais, upon a certificate, No. 467, issued by the recorder under the act of February 17, 1815, for the relief of the sufferers by the earthquake at New Madrid.

2. The claim for Hale, for heirs Perciful, for a preemption under the act of April 12, 1814.

3. The claim of heirs of Beldin for a preemption under the act of May 29, 1830.

Now, if either of these parties have any valid claim to these lands, neither the people of Arkansas, who in convention have memorialized, nor her Representatives, who unanimously ask the public sale of this reservation, either desire or would consent to it.

In order to a correct determination of the respective claims, let us recur to the acts under which these parties claim. The first section of the New Madrid act, under which Rector, assignee of Langlais, claims, provides—

"That any person or persons owning lands in the county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory," * * * "and whose lands have been materially injured by earthquake shall be, and they hereby are, authorized to locate the like quantity of land on any of the public lands of the said Territory, the sale of which is authorized by law."—11 Statutes at Large, p. 211.

Now, these lands were not ceded to the United States by the Qua-Paw Indians until the 24th of August, 1818. So they could not be considered as lands the sale of which was authorized by law under the New Madrid act of 1815.

Mr. Attorney General Wirt long since ruled that the words in an act of Congress authorizing preemption of lands—"the sale of which is authorized by law"—excludes the right of preemption from all lands the sale of which has not been authorized by law at the date of the preemption act. However this may be there is no evidence of survey and location under the act of 1815 by Langlais or his legal representatives until 1838, six years subsequent to these reservations from sale by the United States.

Mr. Secretary Stewart in 1851 rendered an opinion against all the claimants, and was reasoned out in a decision which cuts out alike Langlais, Rector, Hale, and Beldin. It adjudges on full consideration that their claims were wholly invalid in the face of the act reserving the Hot Springs to the use of the United States.

In 1854, the whole matter having again been brought before the Interior Department, Mr. McClelland, then Secretary, rendered a decision against each and all the claimants.

The opinion of Mr. McClelland having been in 1854 submitted to Mr. Attorney General Cushing, and the whole matter having been considered, he concludes his opinion as follows:

"The decision of Mr. Stewart that none of these parties have a valid claim to the Hot Springs was correct, and ought to stand as the determination of the Department."—Attorney General's Opinions, vol. 6, p. 711.

The matter having been again brought before Mr. Secretary Thompson, that officer in 1860 concurred in the decisions of his predecessors, and concludes his decision as follows:

"This case having been repeatedly brought before this Department and fully considered, and the several claims to the land having been repeatedly rejected for reasons which have been concurred in by each succeeding head of the Department through a series of years, I think the time has now arrived at which it is no longer proper to delay a vindication of the position of the Department by appropriate action.

"The entry of Beldin's heirs should therefore now be canceled, the invalidity of all the subsisting claims to this section be declared, and the land held subject to such disposal as Congress may see fit to direct should be made of the same."

After the decision of Mr. Secretary Stewart rejecting all these claims to the Hot Springs and asserting the title of the United States against them all, he allowed an entry to be made in behalf of Beldin, the object of which was to enable him to commence an action of ejectment under the statutes of Arkansas, which provides that the action may be maintained in all cases where the plaintiff claims the possession of the premises under or by virtue of, first, an entry with the register and receiver of the Public Land Office of the United States. Second, a preemption right under the laws of the United States. (Stat. of Ark., ch. 53, sec. 2, p. 344.) Mr. Attorney General Cushing, says:

"It is edifying to see actions of ejectment having for their purpose to dispute the title to parcels of the public domain between parties none of whom pretend anything but an equitable interest, and neither of whom has in fact any title as against the United States, legal or equitable. The parties may eject one another ad libitum; and the party prevailing may thus get up a fallacious appearance or semblance of title, but the fee still remains in the United States, for Congress alone has the power to declare the rule of titles to the public domain; it has accordingly declared a patent to be the superior conclusive evidence of title; and until that issues the fee is in the Government. This being the case it is matter of great consideration whether the Government of the United States ought not to intervene, in some way, itself to defend its own rights which may be seriously prejudiced."

The State of Arkansas has asked that this reservation may be disposed of as indicated in the following memorial of her convention, which is substantially what is asked by the terms of this bill:

Memorial to the Congress of the United States, for the public sale of the Hot Spring reservation in the State of Arkansas.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the constitutional convention of the State of Arkansas, respectfully represent that the public reservation known as the Hot Spring reservation, comprising all that portion of the public domain situated in section twenty-eight, twenty-nine, thirty-two, thirty-three, in township two south; and four and five, in township three, south of range nineteen, west, in the State of Arkansas, is now held and occupied without color of title, by various persons whose claims have never been acknowledged by the United States Government; that the public interest and humanity require that said Springs be made available for public use; and the welfare and settlement of the State is in a great measure dependent upon it. We would, therefore, ask that the same be sold, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to the highest bidder or bidders for cash, after having been laid out into streets, blocks, and lots or parcels of ground, of such form and area as will best facilitate the construction of a town.

That the proceeds arising from the sale of the same be invested in United States securities, and held in trust until otherwise provided by law; and that the accruing interest upon said securities be applied to the common-school fund for the education of all the children of the State. And your memorialists will ever pray.

Adopted February 6, 1868.

Let the Government assert her right, as her law officer has advised, and dispose of this property as asked by this memorial, and the day is not far distant when a great city will rise on this mountain slope which will be the Baden-Baden of America.

Here, where the salubrity of the climate is unsurpassed, especially in the summer season, and where the long genial twilights are inspiring refreshing, will come the pleasure seekers from all parts of the world, and here will resort from year to year the millions of afflicted from all lands to be healed of their many infirmities.

Appropriate the annual accruing interest arising from the securely invested proceeds of the sale of these lands in the education of all the children of the State, and in after years an educated and enlightened people will rise up and call you blessed.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALASKA TERRITORY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 619 to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill extends the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation to and over all the mainland, islands, and waters of the territory ceded to the United States by the emperor of Russia by treaty concluded at Washington on the 30th day of March, 1867, so far as the same may be applicable thereto. Section two constitutes the said territory, with its ports, harbors, bays, rivers, and waters, a customs-collection district, to be called the district of Alaska, for which said district a port of entry shall be established at some convenient point to be designated by the President, at or near the town of Sitka or New Archangel, and a collector of customs shall be appointed who shall reside at the said port of entry, and who shall receive an annual salary of $2,500 in addition to the usual legal fees and emoluments of the office. But his entire compensation shall not exceed $4,000 per annum, or a proportionate sum for a less period of time. Section three authorizes regulations to be prescribed for the nationalization of vessels owned by actual residents of said territory on or since the 20th of June, 1867. Section four empowers the President to restrict and regulate or to prohibit the importation and use of fire-arms, ammunition, and distilled spirits into and within the said territory, and prescribes penalties for the violation of said regulations. Section five provides that the coasting trade between the said territory and any other portion of the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great districts. Section six empowers the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may think proper in relation to the preservation of fur-bearing animals from indiscriminate destruction, provided that no special privilege shall be granted under this act. Section seven provides for the prosecution of violations of this act and of the several laws hereby extended to the said territory and the waters thereof, committed within the limits of the same, in any district court of the United States in California or Oregon or in the district courts of Washington. Section eight authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, penalties, and forfeitures. Section nine provides for the establishment of bonded warehouses. Section ten appropriates the sum of $25,000 to carry this act into effect and meet the expenses of collecting the customs revenue in the territory.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause in section six, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to kill any other, mink, marten, sable, fur-seal, or other fur-bearing animals within the limits of said territory, or in the waters thereof; and any person guilty thereof shall, for each offense, on conviction, be fined in any sum not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court; and all vessels, their tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo, found engaged in violation of this act, shall be forfeited. Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to authorize the killing of any such other, mink, marten, or other fur-bearing animals, except fur-seals, under such regulations as he may prescribe; and it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to prevent the killing of any fur seal, and to provide for the execution of the provisions of this section until it shall be otherwise provided by law.

Mr. DELANO. I call attention to the sixth section, which seems to leave the fur trade entirely at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury, thereby making it subject to such jobs as he may farm out.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman will look at section six in the bill he will consider the amendment that I have proposed from the Committee on Commerce preferable. There are certain kinds of fur-bearing animals upon which the natives subsist or get their living. We do not think we can put a stop to the killing of those kinds without doing great injustice to the people there. But we do prohibit the killing of the fur seal until Congress shall take further action. This is merely a temporary measure until Congress shall have time to digest a code of laws, as they call it, for the government of this whole matter.

Mr. DELANO. I would be glad to have the section reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That until Congress shall otherwise provide by law, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, shall have power to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may think proper in relation to the killing and to the preservation of fur-bearing animals from indiscriminate destruction: Provided, That no special privileges shall be granted under this act.

Mr. FERRISS. I understood the gentleman to say there were several of the fur-bearing animals upon which the inhabitants of the country subsisted. I desire to know whether it is the otter or the mink on which the people live?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman misunderstood me. They get their living by killing the animals and selling their furs.

I now yield to my colleague on the Committee on Commerce, the gentleman from California, [Mr. AXTELL,] who has a more intimate acquaintance with the subject than I have.

Mr. AXTELL. I observe that the sum appropriated to carry out the provisions of this act is left at $25,000. I thought the Committee on Commerce authorized an amendment increasing the amount.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We have not yet come to that.

Mr. AXTELL. We propose to amend the sixth section by prohibiting the killing of the fur-bearing seal. I hope that amendment will prevail. They are very peculiar animals, and if not killed only at certain seasons and under certain regulations they forsake the islands where they usually resort. The Russian Government only allowed the killing of a limited number, and those were to be males of a certain age. The animals are almost tame, and unless the killing of them is regulated, they will soon be exterminated. We thought, as the session was so near its close, it was better to pass this sort of game law prohibiting their being killed at all until the next session of Congress.

Mr. PAINE. I think that in some particulars the amendment of the Committee on Commerce is better than the section of the original bill; but in one particular I think the section is better than the amendment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] informed the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] in answer to a question, that the amendment absolutely prohibits the killing of seals until further legislation by Congress. But I did not so understand the amendment. I understood from the reading that it absolutely prohibits the killing of seals and other animals, with a proviso that they may be killed under certain regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. I am informed that I am incorrect as to seals, and I will admit that it is so. But there is still this difference between the bill as it comes to us from the Senate and the amendment of the committee. The bill, as it comes to us from the Senate, prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from extending any special privileges in regard to these fur-bearing animals; whereas that clause does not appear in the amendment of the committee, unless I am mistaken on that point also, and I listened very carefully to the reading of the amendment. I would inquire whether that clause which prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from extending special privileges is not omitted in the amendment?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is, and I think it would be very well to put it in. I am the last man that wants special privileges given. If the gentleman desires to move that amendment, I will yield to him for the purpose.

Mr. PAINE. I move, then, to amend the amendment by adding to it the words:

Provided, That no special privileges shall be granted under this act.

I offer that amendment, but I shall of course vote against the whole bill.

Mr. AXTELL. I think the Committee on Commerce would agree to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to add to the third section what I send to the Clerk's desk. I will state that the Treasury Department desired that we should put in an amendment providing for six deputy collectors. We declined to do that, as the committee thought they could get along if we added to the section what I now offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that from any deputy collector of customs upon whom there has been or shall hereafter be conferred any of the powers of collector under and by virtue of the twenty-ninth section of the act further to prevent smuggling and for other purposes, approved July 18, 1866, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to require bonds in favor of the United States in such amount as said Secretary shall prescribe for the faithful discharge of official duties by such deputy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now very reluctantly move another amendment to the last section of this bill, because it increases the amount appropriated. The Senate propose to appropriate the amount of $25,000. The Treasury Department say they cannot possibly get along with less than $100,000. The Committee on Commerce do not agree to the increase to that amount, but they have instructed me to move an amendment, which I now do, to increase the appropriation from $25,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] to state to the House whether he does not believe that the result of this legislation will be to increase the expenses of this Government some millions of dollars each year?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am very much afraid of all this legislation in regard to the territory of Alaska. But when the Committee on Commerce, of which I am chairman, instruct me to report a bill with amendments, I am obliged to do so.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill, and being taken, it was agreed to; there being upon a division—ayes sixty-one; noes not counted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 910) for the relief of the grantees of Ann S. Durdin;

A bill (H. R. No. 1052) amendatory of an act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1447) granting the right of way to certain railway corporations over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth.

SYMPATHY WITH CRETE.

Mr. MYERS. The gentleman from Nevada

[Mr. ASHLEY] having withdrawn his objection, I now ask, by direction of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, to take up from the Speaker's table, for consideration at this time, Senate joint resolution No. 169, appealing to the Turkish Government in behalf of the people of Crete.

The joint resolution was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering it to be read a third time.

The first section of the joint resolution, which was read, states that the people of the United States renew the expression of their sympathy with the suffering people of Crete, to whom they are bound by the ties of a common religion, and by the gratitude due to the great race of which the Cretans are a part, and they rejoice to believe that the sufferings of that interesting people may be happily terminated by forbearance on the part of the Turkish Government, and they hereby declare their earnest hope that the Turkish Government will listen kindly to this representation, and speedily adopt such steps as will secure to the Cretans the blessings of peace and the advantages of good government. The second section declares that religion, civilization, and humanity require that the existing contest in Crete shall be brought to a close; and to accomplish this result the civilized Powers of the world should unite in friendly intervention with the Government of Turkey. The third section provides that it shall be the duty of the President to instruct the minister of the United States at Constantinople to co-operate with the ministers of other Powers in all good offices to terminate the sufferings of the people of Crete, and that it shall be the further duty of the President to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the Government of Turkey.

Mr. MYERS. I will now call the previous question, merely stating that this joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, and has the approval of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House; and I believe it is responsive to the wishes of the American people.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was unanimously passed.

Mr. MYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS BY REBELS.

Mr. SHANKS. I am instructed by the select Committee on the Treatment of Prisoners of War and Union Citizens by the rebel authorities to submit a partial report, and to ask for further time to take testimony, the authority heretofore possessed by the committee having been taken away by a resolution of the House adopted to-day.

Mr. NIBLACK. What particular object does the gentleman expect to accomplish by the further prosecution of this inquiry? The war is now over, and the States lately in rebellion are being readmitted into the Union.

Mr. SHANKS. The object is to make a record of the treatment of prisoners of war and of Union citizens by the rebel authorities, so that the country may know what that treatment was. The committee think it important to put upon record the facts in the case, and that such a record will be valuable in all time to come. We think it is highly important that the rebel records should be collated which are now in the War Department, and which they are collecting for us; that they should be collated and put in such shape that the American people may see and know for themselves what has been the treatment of prisoners of war and of Union citizens by the men who were in rebellion against the Government. We want to make such a record that men hereafter will not commit these high crimes against the defenders of the Republic. The committee in all earnestness ask this House not to cut off the investigation which shall make such a record.

Mr. SPALDING. Does the gentleman wish the House to rescind the resolution which it passed to-day, prohibiting committees from sitting during the recess when such sitting involves expense to the Government? This committee will have the right to sit; but unless that resolution be rescinded, it will not have the right to impose any expense upon the Government by this investigation.

Mr. SHANKS. I withdraw the previous question temporarily, and yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. In order that we may know what this committee has been doing and what it now proposes to do, I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] whether the committee has, during the whole of this session, employed a clerk, with nothing to do?

Mr. SHANKS. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the question very frankly. The committee has a clerk, but the other part of the remark is not true; the clerk has had much to do.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I did not make any assertion; I simply asked a question. It is the answer that must be true or untrue.

Mr. SHANKS. I do not wish to have any controversy with my friend from Pennsylvania. This committee has had a clerk, and that clerk has had something to do. The business of the House has required the individual attention of members, and we have not had an opportunity to do as much work as we desired.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then if the committee has had nothing to do the clerk has had nothing to do.

Mr. SHANKS. I said we had not done so much work as we desired to do.

Mr. SPALDING. Let me ask the gentleman how much this committee has already drawn from the contingent fund?

Mr. SHANKS. A little over six thousand dollars.

Mr. SPALDING. "A little over six thousand dollars!" And yet the gentleman wants to continue the investigation.

Mr. SHANKS. This House has voted to pay $100,000 for the capture of Jefferson Davis. That was money squandered upon a useless object; for the Government has never made any use of his capture by bringing him to justice. The object of the investigation, which we propose to continue, is to make a record of the treatment of the patriotic men who served our country faithfully in the field, and who, when prisoners, were subjected to inhuman treatment at the hands of rebels. If the House does not think it a worthy object to put on record the sufferings of the men who perished in the cause of their country, and the crimes of those who were arrayed against the Government, be it so. I shall have discharged my duty by presenting this question to the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. What we desire to know is whether this committee has done anything. If it has not, we had better discharge it, and if we think the investigation should be continued, appoint another committee.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask that the resolution reported by the committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Treatment of Prisoners of War and Union Citizens be authorized to continue their investigation during the recess of Congress, with full powers in accordance with the resolutions of the House of July 10 and 13, 1867.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that this resolution be laid on the table. The committee has now power to continue this investigation, but it has not power to employ a clerk with nothing to do, and to incur other expenses for no useful purpose.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope that the yeas and nays will be ordered. I am for continuing this investigation and ferreting out these scoundrels who inflicted such barbarities upon our soldiers.

Mr. SHANKS. I am requested to state how many witnesses we have examined. The number thus far examined is one hundred and forty.

Mr. SPALDING. Well, I think that is about enough.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 80, not voting 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Axtell, Baker, Beck, Boyden, Cake, Delano, Dixon, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Higby, Hinds, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Ketcham, Knott, Marshall, Niblack, Phelps, Pomeroy, Ross, Scofield, Spalding, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, and Elihu B. Washburne—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Buckland, Buckley, Roderrick R. Butler, Cary, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cullom, Dawes, Deweese, Dockery, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Halsey, Hamilton, Haughey, Hawkins, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Koontz, Laffin, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, Mann, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—80.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Baldwin, Barnes, Burnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Callis, Chanler, Churchill, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dodge, Donnelly, Edwards, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Heaton, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Loucheur, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, O'Neill, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Poland, Price, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Twichell, Upson, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—106.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SHANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a Senate bill, a similar one to which has already passed the House.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 358) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish cannon to Soldiers' Monument Associations of Pequannock and Paterson, New Jersey; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 328) for the donation of certain columns.

It further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to a bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn, agreed to the conference asked for, and had appointed Mr. STEWART, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. BUCKALEW, managers of such conference on the part of the Senate.

It further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on a bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution.

It further announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed a bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarrahan.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SPALDING. I submit the following report from a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the first clause of the amendment of the House to the eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the second clause of the amendment of the House to the eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out all of said second clause, to wit: four sections, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the superintendent of the said Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb shall at the commencement of every December session of Congress make a full and complete statement of all the expenditures made by virtue of any appropriations by Congress, said statement shall include the amount paid to said superintendent, and also for teachers, to whom paid, and the rate at which paid; and all expenditures for the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum shall be under the direction of the Surgeon General of the Army, who shall also report to Congress at every December session a full and accurate account of all expenditures made by said asylum out of appropriations by Congress, and all accounts for all appropriations made by Congress for charitable purposes and for charitable institutions in the District of Columbia, shall be audited by the First Auditor of the Treasury. But nothing herein contained shall take from the Secretary of the Interior the jurisdiction he now has over the subject of charities and charitable institutions in the District of Columbia."

L. M. MORRILL,
J. W. PATTERSON,
A. McDONALD,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

R. P. SPALDING,
S. S. MARSHALL,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 487) to disapprove the act of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, redistricting the Territory and reassigning the judges thereto; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am directed by the Committee on the Territories to put this bill on its passage.

The bill was reported. It disapproves of the act of the Legislative Assembly, approved January 25, 1868, entitled "An act to define the several judicial districts of the Territory, and assigning the judges thereto."

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MANUFACTURERS' NATIONAL BANK.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, the bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York to change its location, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first, second, and third time, and passed.

Mr. POMEROY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 102, providing for the formation of corporations and regulating the same in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That bill is too voluminous to get through to-night. I ask its reference to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it could scarcely be enrolled unless the clerks should do it on Sunday.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

RECORDER OF DEEDS IN THE DISTRICT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 491) to provide for the appointment of register of deeds in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

It provides that from and after the passage of this act the style of the register of deeds of the District of Columbia shall be "recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia." Section two vests the appointment of recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia in the supreme court of said District, and provides that his compensation shall not exceed the rate of $8,000 per annum, exclusive of the necessary expenses of said office. Section three makes it the duty of the recorder to employ a sufficient number of copyists to enable him to keep up the current records and indexes of said office with necessary and reasonable promptness; and, as the fees and income of said office will justify, to copy such of the records as have become defaced or obliterated, and to index the same. It also regulates the compensation of the copyists. Section four relates to the disposition of the fees and emoluments of the office. Section five fixes the legal fees of the recorder. Section six legalizes the recording of deeds and other written instruments, and copies of papers recorded, made and certified by William G. Flood as acting register of deeds since the death of Edward G. Eddie, late register of deeds, up to the date of the appointment of a recorder under this act, and declares Mr. Flood entitled to the legal fees and emoluments that may have accrued.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MATTHEW LOW.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 535) to reward the services of Matthew Low, of Nassau, New Providence; which was read a first and second time.

It appropriates the sum of $2,000 in recognition of his services in carrying to the commander of the United States gunboat Tioga the important information on which he acted in intercepting and capturing the blockade-runner Granite City on the 22d of March, 1863, near the port of Nassau.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move its reference to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATE UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 555) authorizing allowance of the claim of Minnesota to lands for the support of the State University; which was read a first and second time.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, the bill was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the various votes of reference; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAM-PACKET COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 236) in addition to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown Steam Packet Company; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ALLISON moved that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 417) to amend an act entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishing of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by the said State of all Territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims on the United States, and to establish territorial government in New Mexico; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The Committee on the Territories have instructed me to ask that that bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. The act referred to is to be amended so as to provide:

Every bill which shall have passed the council and house of representatives of said Territory shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor of the Territory; if he approve he shall sign it, but if he do not approve it, he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two thirds of that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that house it shall become a law, the Governor's objections to the contrary notwithstanding. But in such cases the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and entered upon the journal of each house respectively. And if the Governor shall not return any bill presented to him for approval, after its passage by both Houses of the Legislature, within three days (Sundays excepted) after such presentation, the same shall become a law in like manner as if the Governor had approved it. Provided, however, That the Assembly shall not have adjourned sine die during the three days prescribed as above, in which case it shall not become a law.

The bill further provides that the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico shall hereafter be ex officio superintendent of public buildings and grounds, and shall have control and management of all public buildings now erected, in progress of erection, or to be hereafter erected, and of all grounds pertaining thereto; and he is to be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall establish such rules in relation to these public buildings and grounds as in his judgment he may devise, and for his services as such superintendent the secretary is to receive an annual salary of $1,000. It is to be the duty of the secretary of the Territory, upon the convening of the Legislature thereof, to administer the oath of office to the members-elect of the two houses and the officers thereof when chosen; and no other person shall be competent to administer the oath, save in the absence of the secretary; in which case any one member of either house may administer the oath to the presiding officer-elect, and he shall administer the same to the members and other officers. The annual salary of the secretary of the Territory is to be $2,000 per annum from and after the 1st day of February, 1867.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will say that at the organization of this Territory the veto power—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is no objection to that part of the bill, but the other part which gives additional compensation to the secretary of the Territory as superintendent of public buildings I think ought not to pass.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The Committees on Territories of the two Houses were unanimously in favor of that provision. I ask for the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, agreed to the conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MORGAN, Mr. CRAGIN, and Mr. HARLAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

ACT OF 29TH JULY, 1850.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 449) to revive and continue in force the act of the 29th July, 1850, and the act amendatory thereof of the 2d of April, 1852; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what subject this bill relates to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICERS DROPPED FROM ARMY ROLLS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 151, to drop from the rolls of the Army certain officers absent without authority from their commands; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have been instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs of this House to ask that this joint resolution be passed.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the following named officers of the Army, reported by the Secretary of War as absent from their commands without authority, be, and they are hereby, dropped from the rolls, with loss of all pay and allowances, namely: First Lieutenant D. H. Weiland, sixth infantry; First Lieutenant H. D. Lanty, fourth infantry; First Lieutenant A. J. McDonald, fifth artillery; First Lieutenant Richard Wilson, third artillery; Second Lieutenant J. W. Godman, sixth infantry, and Second Lieutenant Guy Morrison, tenth infantry; this resolution to take effect from the date at which they absented themselves from their commands.

The joint resolution was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOUNT VERNON LADIES' ASSOCIATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 588, for the relief of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that that bill be now put upon its passage.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that the bill contains an appropriation, and I therefore move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that the gentleman will not insist upon his motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I must insist upon it. This matter has been once before the Committee on Appropriations, and they rejected it unanimously.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would rather it should go to the Committee of the Whole under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole has priority of the motion to refer it to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I make that motion.

The question was then taken upon referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole, and it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 44, noes 68.

The question recurred upon referring the bill to the Committee on Appropriations; and being taken, it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 1446, to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn.

DISTRICT COURT IN UTAH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 576, relating to the district court of the United States of Utah Territory; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hope the bill will be put upon its passage now.

Mr. AXTELL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Governor of Utah Territory shall assign the district judges of said Territory to their respective districts, and appoint the times and places of holding court in each of said districts, not exceeding two terms in each district in any one year.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I desire to state to the House the reasons for the passage of this bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not think any debate is necessary. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was first upon the motion of Mr. AXTELL, that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 59.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, called for tellers

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were twelve in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The motion to refer was accordingly not agreed to.

The bill was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays. I know what the bill is, and I do not want it to pass.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were eleven in the affirmative, not one fifth of the last vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers upon the yeas and nays; and there were six in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. BINGHAM, from a conference committee, submitted the following report:

The conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

WILLIAM M. STEWART,

HENRY WILSON,

CHARLES R. BUCKALEW,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. BINGHAM,

JAMES B. BECK,

JAMES M. ASHLEY,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call the previous question on agreeing to the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MULLINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. As the question on agreeing to the conference report is substantially the same question as that on the passage of the bill, and as bills removing political disabilities must, under the fourteenth constitutional amendment, be passed by a two-thirds vote, such a vote is necessary on agreeing to this report.

On agreeing to the report, there were—ayes 86, noes 25.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the report was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN POTTS

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 595) for the relief of John Potts; which was read a first and second time.

The bill appropriates $3,500 to pay John Potts, chief clerk of the Department of War, for services as disbursing clerk from 1861 to July 1, 1868. It also provides that it shall be lawful hereafter to pay the disbursing clerk of the Department of War $200 yearly in addition to his salary, whether such officer shall have been appointed from the clerks of the fourth class or from a higher grade.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move the reference of this bill to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope that the bill will not be referred. This officer was called on to perform this extra duty for which he has never been compensated. The bill has been examined by the Committee of the Senate, and has passed that body unanimously.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. We have had many bills of this kind before our committee, and we think that no such bill ought to pass without examination. Some general principle should be followed with reference to all such cases. I call for the previous question on the motion to refer.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WARD moved to consider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM GEORGIA.

Mr. BINGHAM presented the credentials of Mr. P. M. B. Young, claiming a seat as a Representative from the State of Georgia; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

GOVERNMENT OF THE ARMY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 529) establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move the reference of this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRUSTEES OF COLORED SCHOOLS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 609) transferring the duties of trustees of colored schools of Washington and Georgetown; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let that bill be referred.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it be read.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We do not want to pass it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know but it ought to be passed. I ask that it be read.

The bill was read. It provides that the several acts of Congress authorizing the appointment and defining the duties of the board of trustees of colored schools for the cities of Washington and Georgetown in the District of Columbia shall be so modified as to transfer the duties heretofore imposed upon said trustees of colored schools to the trustees of public schools in those cities; and that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith shall be repealed.

The bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WAR CLAIMS OF KANSAS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 214, to authorize the Secretary of War to settle the claims of the State of Kansas for services of the militia called out by the Governor of that State upon the requisition of Major General Curtis, the commander of the United States forces in that State; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to strike out that part of the bill which makes an appropriation.

Mr. DELANO. I understand the bill makes an appropriation, and I therefore make the point of order that it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill contains the following section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioners to be appointed as aforesaid shall, before proceeding to the discharge of their duties, be sworn that they will carefully examine the accounts existing between the United States and the State of Kansas, and that they will, to the best of their ability, make a just, true, and impartial statement thereof, as required by this act. They shall receive such compensation for their services as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding ten dollars per day for each commissioner. And the amount necessary to defray said expenses and the award made by the commissioners, not to exceed $259,000, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill does make an appropriation, but it may be referred to one of the standing committees.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST ROAD BILL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 589, to establish certain post roads; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. These post roads have been already provided for. If there be no objection it will be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

FORT LEAVENWORTH MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 16) donating a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation for the exclusive use of a public road; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that bill be put on its passage. It grants the right of way through the reservation for a wagon-road.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has it the recommendation of the officers of the Army?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think, then, we had better not pass it.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. It has been approved by the Secretary of War and the General of the Army. It provides for the location of a public road.

The bill was read. It provides that a strip of land one hundred feet in width along the southern boundary of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation, in the State of Kansas, extending from the Missouri river to the western boundary thereof, be set apart for the perpetual and exclusive use of a public road; and the said road shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from tolls or other charges upon the transportation of any property, troops, or mails of the United States.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to add the usual clause, that Congress reserves the right to repeal, alter, or amend.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VALLEJO AND HUMBOLDT RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 849) granting lands to the State of California to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the town of Vallejo to Humboldt bay, in the State of California; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DELANO. I move that bill be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. DELANO. I demand the previous question.

Mr. AXTELL. I hope that motion will not prevail. The bill has been before the Committee on the Public Lands, and the chairman of that committee [Mr. JULIAN] gave me authority to say that he desired its passage. I believe other gentlemen will bear me out when I say that this bill ought to be passed. It comes from the Senate because the House Committee could not report it. The grant is guarded as we guarded day before yesterday all grants to railroads. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will allow it to be put on its passage.

Mr. DELANO. I cannot comply with the gentleman's request. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HIGBY. I have not examined this bill, but I will state that the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands [Mr. JULIAN] came to me before he left town, some two days ago, and gave me to understand that he was in favor of its passage. I think he said that a bill in the same words had been before the committee and had been favorably considered. He stated that also to members of the House.

Mr. DELANO. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOPKINS. I simply wish to say that what the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] has stated is correct. This bill has been before the Committee on the Public Lands, and it comes before the House in the same form which the committee agreed upon, unanimously, I believe. The same provisions that were contained in the bill we passed yesterday are incorporated in this bill, providing that the land shall be held by the State of California and sold, and that the proceeds shall be paid to the company.

Mr. HIGBY. Allow me to state further that the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands said that this bill contained a provision in the way of restriction which the House bill did not, and which by some singular inadvertence was overlooked by the House committee.

Mr. DELANO. I desire now to call the attention of the House to the fact that this bill grants to the Humboldt Bay and Vallejo Railroad Company one million five hundred thousand acres of land.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How much?

Mr. DELANO. A million and a half.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is enough, in all conscience.

Mr. DELANO. We are now asked to pass a bill making this enormous grant at this hour of the session without any examination by a committee of this House. But that is not all. There is already a company chartered by the Legislature of California to build a railroad from Humboldt bay to San Francisco, which company has gone on and obtained subscriptions from the counties through which the road is to pass. That company asks, if this appropriation is to be made, the same benefit at least that this company is to receive. This company now seeks to lay hands upon these one million five hundred thousand acres and monopolize them. Now, where there is so much doubt as would arise in a conflict of this kind, I ask if it would be right for us at this late hour of the session and of the night to pass this bill? I could go into further reasons for referring the bill, but it seems to me I have said enough. I therefore demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. DELANO, to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands, it was agreed to.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 364) granting a pension to Violet Henry;

An act (S. No. 637) to authorize the city of Washington to issue bonds for the purpose of paying the floating debt of the city;

An act (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Nancy Smith;

An act (S. No. 630) granting increase of pension to Nancy A. Stocks;

An act (S. No. 442) to amend section one of an act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863;

An act (S. No. 606) granting a pension to Robert Watson;

An act (S. No. 598) for the relief of Mary Scott;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 172) to construe an act entitled "An act to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core;"

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to admit certain persons to the Naval Academy; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia.

MRS. L. T. POTTER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 596) for the relief of Mrs. L. T. Potter; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. That bill contains an appropriation. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 301) authorizing the purchase of certain public lands in Alabama; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BUCKLEY moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KOONTZ moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN FLORIDA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 604) regulating the times and places of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask that that bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It provides that the times and places of holding the United States district and circuit courts for the northern district of Florida shall hereafter be as follows: at Jacksonville on the first Monday of December, at Tallahassee on the first Monday of February, and at Pensacola on the first Monday of March, and that the terms of the courts heretofore held at St. Augustine and Apalachicola shall be discontinued.

Mr. HAMILTON. I demand the previous question on the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Does not the bill provide for holding the courts at more places than necessary in that State? I would inquire what has been the fact heretofore in reference to holding these courts?

Mr. HAMILTON. They have been held at three places.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAMILTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORPORATIONS CREATED.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 610) in relation to corporations created by laws of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 617) to reduce the military peace establishment of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report some amendments to that bill and to ask that it be put upon its passage, and I call upon the House to insist on considering it now. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The first section of the bill, which was read, provides that the line of the Army as now constituted shall be reduced to thirty regiments of infantry, eight regiments of cavalry, and four regiments of artillery; such reduction to be effected by the consolidation of regiments of the several arms now in the service, and that three regiments of infantry shall be composed of colored troops and three of the troops of the Veteran Reserve; and one regiment of cavalry shall be composed of colored troops. The second section directs the President, so soon as the public interest and necessity will admit, to order the muster-out of enlisted men now in the service until the total number remaining in service shall be reduced to thirty thousand: of cavalry, six thousand; of artillery, forty-eight hundred; of infantry, eighteen thousand five hundred, and of enlisted engineers and ordnance department, seven hundred; provided that until such reduction is reached no further enlistments into the Army shall be made, and thereafter there shall be no more than thirty thousand enlisted men in service at any one time, unless hereafter authorized by law. The third section provides that all the bands now in the service organized under the provisions of section seven of an act to fix the military peace establishment of the United States, approved July 28, 1866, except the band at the Military Academy, shall be honorably discharged without delay, and shall receive full pay and allowances to the date of their discharge. The fourth section provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, immediately after the passage of this act, to appoint a board of competent officers, whose duty it shall be to prepare and submit to the Secretary of War a plan for the reduction of the officers of the Army, and designating from the officers of the line of the several grades now in service those to be retained on duty with the consolidated regiments, those to be wholly discharged from the service, and those not retained on duty with the regiments herein authorized whom it is deemed advisable or proper to retain in service; and it is made the duty of the Secretary of War to submit such plan to the action of Congress at its next ensuing session, together with the names and rank of the officers to be so retained or so discharged; and until the action of Congress be had thereon no other action shall be taken on said plan.

Before the Clerk proceeded to read the fifth section of the bill,

Mr. INGERSOLL said: I desire to appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. GARFIELD] to take the sense of the House on the question of referring this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs without further reading. If the sense of the House is in favor of the reference, then he should accede to it; if not, then we can go on with the bill.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order to move that the House now adjourn?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order. But the Chair would say that there are now two conference committees which have not yet made reports. One of the committees, the Chair understands, has agreed upon its report; the other, upon the funding bill, will probably not agree upon a report to-night. After the committee which has agreed shall have made its report there will be nothing in the way of a recess until Monday morning, except the bill now under consideration, and some ten or fifteen bills upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that I have no other purpose than to know the will of the House in regard to this bill. It is due to the Committee on Military Affairs and to a very large number of persons who have spoken to the committee during the last few weeks in regard to this bill to say that it is thought by a very large number of the members of this House—I do not know whether a majority or not—that we ought to provide for a reduction of the Army, and that especially we ought to provide, as is provided by the ninth section of this bill, some means by which the people in the southern States which have been reconstructed can protect themselves. This bill was very elaborately considered in the Senate, and is there regarded as a very important bill. And it is deemed very necessary that the seven States recently readmitted into the Union, and now relieved from military control, should be provided with means to protect themselves.

I have been requested by several members to submit a proposition to the House for the purpose of ascertaining whether we will refer the whole of this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, or whether we will take out one section, the ninth, and proceed to consider it at this time. I prefer that the whole bill should take its fate together. I am willing, however, that the sense of the House shall be taken. Let it be understood that this is a test question.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question on referring the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On the question there were—ayes 64, noes 44.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 62, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Banks, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Bowen, Boyden, Calkins, Caryl, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Dawes, Dockery, Driggs, Elliot, Farnsworth, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hotchkiss, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Koontz, Ladin, Lincoln, Mallory, Mann, Marshall, McKee, Miller, Moore, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Peters, Phelps, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, Sawyer, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Van Trump, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, and Stephen F. Wilson—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Beatty, Benton, Blackburn, Boies, Buckland, Buckley, Calkins, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Culom, Delano, Dewesse, Ela, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Hamilton, Higby, Hinds, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Jencks, Alexander H. Jones, Kelley, Kelsey, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Maynard, McClurg, Mercur, Mullins, Paine, Perham, Pierce, Pile, Polsley, Kaum, Schenck, Scofield, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Sypher, Thomas, Twiehell, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Bailey, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Bucomall, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Chanler, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleson, Eldridge, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Holman, Hooper, Samuel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kitchen, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Pike, Plants, Price, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Root, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taft, John Trimble, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—93.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. ARNELL obtained leave to print as part of the debates remarks on the bill just referred. [See Appendix.]

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 328) for the donation of certain columns; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 358) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish cannon to Soldiers' Monument Associations of Pequannock and Paterson, New Jersey.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. No. 396) for the relief of Samuel Tibbets.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 144) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.

The message further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation, over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes; had asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. MORRILL of Maine, and Mr. DOOLITTLE.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United for the capture of Jefferson Davis;

An act (H. R. No. 1375) to transfer to the Department of the Interior certain powers and duties now exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury, in connection with Indian affairs; and

An act (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to state that the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the funding bill, have been engaged with the conferees on the part of the Senate; but it is impossible for them, on account of business in the Senate, to remain longer with us to-night. We have proceeded so far as to satisfy ourselves there is every reasonable probability of our agreeing to a report between now and Monday morning, and reporting a funding bill that will be satisfactory. I make this statement with a view to impress upon members the importance of keeping up a quorum on Monday. If we can adjourn so as to meet as early as eight or nine o'clock on Monday morning, the matter can be arranged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state there are only fifteen members over a quorum in the Hall. Many members have designed returning home to-morrow, and as the conference committee has given notice of important business on Monday morning, the Chair trusts a quorum will remain until that time.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BOYDEN and Mr. DOCKERY were granted leave to print remarks as part of the debates. [See Appendix.]

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed, as the select committee ordered today to inquire in reference to Prince Edward Island, Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, Mr. POLAND, and Mr. BECK.

EXECUTIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KELSEY. I submit the following report from a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first and second amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

L. M. MORRILL,
JAMES HARRLAN,
A. H. CRAGIN.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. H. KELSEY,
W. B. STOKES.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted.

Mr. KELSEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DELANO moved that the House take a recess until nine o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. ROSS moved to amend by taking a recess until eleven o'clock Monday morning. The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to amend by taking a recess until ten o'clock Monday morning.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. DELANO's motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five minutes after ten o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until nine o'clock Monday morning.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The House, at nine o'clock a. m., [Monday, July 27,] resumed its legislative session of Saturday last.

DEMPSEY AND O'TOOLE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is it in order to call for the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I ask unanimous consent to take up and pass a joint resolution (S. R. No. 175) relative to the recent contract for stationery with the Department of the Interior.

The resolution was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to annul and cancel a contract made by him with Dempsey & O'Toole for supplying the Department of the Interior and the several bureaus and offices thereof with stationery for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, under the advertisement issued May 25, 1868, and to enter into a contract for the articles mentioned in said advertisement with Blanchard & Mohun, the latter being the lowest and best bidders therefor.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman might have stated the grounds of his objection to a contract by which the Government is "choused" out of twenty thousand dollars or more.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. There is a difference of opinion on that.

CONTRACTS PAYABLE IN COIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I report back from the Committee of Ways and Means Senate bill No. 180, relative to contracts payable in coin, and move that it be laid on the table, and that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish my colleague would allow that to lie over till next session. I would not commit the House against it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw it at the suggestion of my colleague. It will remain with the Committee of Ways and Means.

DUTIES ON COPPER ORES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I report back again the bill (H. R. No. 1460) to regulate the duties on imported copper and copper ores.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot prevent its introduction. The Chair will entertain the objection as a point of order that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a moment to offer a resolution about one of the employes of the House?

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman will withdraw his point of order I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROSS. Let it be reported for information.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to let it be reported.

PAY OF A HOUSE EMPLOYÉ.

Mr. ROSS, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to pay from the contingent fund to William Henry Hall, Jr., an assistant in the east clock-room, the compensation of a laborer during the time for which he has served or shall continue to serve in that capacity.

DUTIES ON COPPER ORES—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his objection to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. ROSS. This is about copper. My objection is they will add on other things, raising the tariff.

Several MEMBERS. No; we will not.

Mr. ROSS. I withdraw my objection on that condition.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill was read a first, second, and third time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Let the bill be reported.

The bill was reported. It provides that from and after the passage of the act, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the articles herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following specified duties and rates of duty, that is to say: On all copper imported in the form of ores, three cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all regulus of copper, and on all black or coarse copper, four cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all old copper fit only for remanufacture, four cents per pound; on all copper in plates, bars, ingots, pigs, and in other forms not manufactured or herein enumerated, five cents per pound.

Mr. BANKS. I object to that bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the demand for the previous question for the purpose of making a statement of about two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Senate has asked a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill in relation to extending the customs laws to Alaska Territory. If there is no objection the House will reciprocate the request.

Mr. BANKS. I object to any business until this question is settled. I make the point of order that this should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It is made too late.

Mr. BANKS. As soon as the bill was read I objected. I would have objected before if I had known what it was.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is too late.

Mr. BANKS. I object on the ground that it was not read, and no opportunity was had to make the objection before. I never would have consented to consider the bill if I had known what it was. I insist upon a division of the House on the question.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill was read when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] objected. He then asked leave to offer a resolution, which was adopted, and then he stated that he would withdraw his objection on condition that nothing else should be added to the bill. The Chair asked if there was further objection. There was none, and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] asked to have the bill reported in full.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say that it is the constant practice of the Chair, and it is a just practice, to have a bill read, reserving the right of objecting until it shall have been read. I heard the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Ross,] but I did not know what the bill was.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been three times attempted to be reported, and the Chair supposed that every member was familiar with its provisions.

Mr. SCHENCK. And it has already been reported in full.

Mr. BANKS. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know how precious our time is. I wish simply to explain that the Committee of Ways and Means were very reluctant, after the failure to get through anything like a more general provision of tariff, embracing other matters, to bring forward a specific bill; but looking over the whole ground again and again they came to the conclusion that if there was any one thing which stands out among all others with a claim to have some legislation which shall relieve those engaged in the interest from the great difficulties and suffering under which they now labor it is this copper interest. The copper interest, every one knows, is very large, especially in the Lake Superior region. It was once so promising and flourishing that they almost scorned to ask protection for it in any way as the other productions of the country were protected. But since then there has been protection extended to the copper interest, mostly from five to seven per cent. ad valorem, and it is only that now, while lead, iron, and other corresponding interests have forty, fifty, and sixty per cent. protection, copper has up to this hour only had from five to seven per cent., the highest of any protective duty attached to any form of copper being seven per cent. The bill now proposed will give protection to the amount of thirty per cent.

Mr. BANKS. I state as a question of order that I have had no right to object to the bill on the ground that it must be considered in Committee of the Whole for the reason that I never heard it read, and knew not what it was. I submit to the Chair that I have not lost my right to object on the question of order that this bill must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on two grounds; first, on the ground which he has already stated, and second, on the ground that a point of order cannot be renewed by the suggestion of additional reasons. That rule is to be found in the Digest.

Mr. BANKS. My objection is that I have had no power, no opportunity, no information on which I could raise the question of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman mistakes his own want of observation for want of opportunity.

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; not at all. I was attending every moment to the business before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has for the second time overruled the point of order.

FOREIGN AND COASTING TRADE.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 266) to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes; and the same was placed upon the Speaker's table.

DUTIES ON COPPER ORES—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was saying that the amount of protection afforded by this bill does not yet bring copper up to the standard of the average protection on like commodities. But another consideration is this; and with this statement I close: under the existing law such has been the prostration in regard to our copper mines and mining that there are now hundreds of operatives absolutely starving, or going to the poor-house, or endeavoring by the aid of charity to get away from the mining regions. Business is necessarily closing up there, and the steamboats heretofore running upon the lakes are stopping their trips, or reducing them from daily to weekly trips. The whole matter is languishing for want of some aid in this way. These are the considerations which induced the committee to make an exception in regard to one particular interest. And they were instructed to make exception only as to copper, although there are several other things that a number of us, and among them myself, would like to have legislated upon this session if possible.

Mr. KELLEY. I would ask the gentleman if he cannot consent to add a clause to this bill in relation to nickel?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the consent given by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] no proposition to amend the bill can be entertained now except by unanimous consent. He withdrew his objection to the bill upon the express understanding, repeated by the Chair, that nothing should be added to the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. And I will state that I would like if possible to extend the provisions of the bill to the manufacture of hair cloth and to the flaxseed interest, in which my constituents are much interested.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would inquire if my colleague, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] who reported the general tariff bill, has consented to this bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman concurred entirely with the rest of the committee, that if action on his bill could not be had at this session, then this bill in relation to the duty on copper should be presented to the House for his action.

Mr. O'NEILL. The question I was going to ask is this, although I know this copper interest is languishing very much at this time, still there is another interest which comes home to all of us, I mean the book interest.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yielded to the gentleman for a question, not for an argument on the book interest.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] that although the lead interest, which is very important, is not included in this bill, still considering the depressed condition of the copper interest of Michigan I think it would be well to pass this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will state what I want to say in the form of a question. Is not the gentleman aware that I have been in favor of this proposition from the beginning, but opposed to its introduction now lest our tariff should fare precisely as our internal tax has fared, by piece-meal legislation? And I would also ask the gentleman whether by passing this bill we will not be losing a friend, or rather making an enemy to any general action on our tariff?

Mr. SCHENCK. I think we are not making an enemy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I object to singling out one interest in preference to another interest which the gentleman admits needs additional legislation.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 18; no quorum voting.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion for a call of the House was agreed to.

The roll was then called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Chanler, Cook, Cornell, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Edwards, Eldridge, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Golladay, Goss, Gravelly, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Heaton, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Julian, Kitchen, Knott, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Munger, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Nunn, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Pomeroy, Price, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Root, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stone, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James B. Wilson, Stephen E. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward.

The SPEAKER. A quorum having answered to their names, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with, if there be no objection.

No objection was made; and further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question upon the bill regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores.

Mr. BANKS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BANKS and Mr. SCHENCK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 24.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurring on ordering the main question,

Mr. BANKS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1455) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 1457) to pay for indexing the tax bill;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 325) relative to the pay of the chief clerk in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to aid in relieving from peonage women and children of the Navajo Indians.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 643) for the relief of William A. Griffin.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed House bill of the following title, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1363) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel B. Bidwell.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 396) for the relief of Samuel Tibbets;

An act (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 910) for the relief of the grantees of Ann D. Durling;

An act (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions;

An act (H. R. No. 1052) amendatory of an act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856;

An act (H. R. No. 1131) regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases for the protection of officers and agents of the Government, and for the better defense of the Treasury against unlawful claims;

An act (H. R. No. 1447) granting the right of way to certain railway companies over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth; and

An act (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

COMMITTEE ON REVISAL OF THE LAWS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to make at this time a privileged report from the Committee on the Rules, to which there will be no objection. That committee has instructed me to report a rule establishing, instead of the present Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business, a Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to consist of nine members, their duties to be the same as those of the present special Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] is chairman of the select Committee on the Revision of the Laws and also of the standing Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business, the latter committee never having any business. If there be no objection the rule proposed by the Committee on the Rules will be adopted.

There was no objection.

DUTY ON COPPER ORES—AGAIN.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the conference committee is not ready to report the funding bill, and whether that is not of more public importance than this bill?

Mr. DRIGGS. I object to debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. The bill has not yet come from the Senate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object to hazing the funding bill on account of this bill.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 80, not voting 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Artell, Bailey, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Bingham, Boyden, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Callis, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Deweese, Dockery, Driggs, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, French, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haughey, Heaton, Hill, Hinds, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, William Lawrence, Logan, Logan, Loughridge, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Myers, Norris, O'Neill, Paine, Pierce, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Sypher, Taylor, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Banks, Boutwell, Brownell, Sidney Clarke, Dawes, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Fields, Hawkins, Kerr, Ladin, Lincoln, Mann, Marshall, Mercier, Niblack, Peters, Randall, Ross, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Van Trump, and William B. Washburn—30.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Chanler, Cook, Cornell, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Edwards, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asabel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kitchen, Knott, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Moorhead, Newsham, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Price, Prince, Prunty, Robinson, Root, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Stone, Taffe, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward 97.

So the main question was ordered to be now put.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 16) donating a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation for the exclusive use of a public road;

An act (S. No. 487) to disapprove an act of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, redistricting the Territory and reassigning the judges thereof;

An act (S. No. 621) authorizing the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York to change its location;

An act (S. No. 576) relating to the district courts of Utah Territory;

An act (S. No. 604) regulating the times and places of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 169) appealing to the Turkish Government in behalf of the people of Crete;

An act (S. No. 417) to amend an act entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by the said State of all territory claimed by her, exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico;"

An act (S. No. 491) to provide for the appointment of recorder of deeds in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) to drop from the rolls of the Army certain officers absent without authority from their commands.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1455) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 1457) to pay for indexing the tax bill;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 867) to aid in relieving from peonage women and children of the Navajo Indians; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 825) relative to the pay of the chief clerk in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House.

EMILY B. BIDWELL.

The SPEAKER. House bill No. 1863 granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, has been returned from the Senate with an amendment increasing the pension in the case of Sarah Hackleman, widow of the late Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman. It is the case which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has had in charge. If there be no objection the Senate amendment will be concurred in.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DUTY ON COPPER ORE—AGAIN.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to lay the pending bill on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 71; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. THOMAS and Mr. SCOFIELD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes 88.

Mr. ELDRIDGE and Mr. BANKS demanded the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays the Chair reported—ayes twenty, not one fifth of the last vote.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. BANKS. Count the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands tellers, which supersedes a count, being a revision of the Speaker's count.

On ordering tellers there were—ayes twenty-one.

So tellers were refused.

Mr. BANKS. I have a right to a count of the other side.

The SPEAKER. That would be true if a count by the House by tellers did not supersede a count by the Speaker.

Mr. BANKS. Then I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the decision he has made. Upon a count by the Chair twenty members demanded the yeas and nays. The Chair decided that that was not one fifth of the last vote. The gentleman from Massachusetts then demanded a count of the other side, but the gentleman from Wisconsin demanded tellers, which the Chair decided superseded the count of the other side by the Chair. On ordering tellers twenty-two members rose which was not a sufficient number. The gentleman from Massachusetts appeals from that decision.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from California [Mr. HENRY] rose before the Chair declared the count, so that the count should have been twenty-two.

The SPEAKER. There were twenty-one votes by the count of the Chair, but the Clerk informed him that another member rose, making twenty-two. That, however, is not a sufficient number.

Mr. ROSS. I demand the yeas and nays on the appeal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on sustaining the decision of the Chair; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 121, nays 1, not voting 98; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Bently, Beck, Bingham, Blackburn, Boies, Bottwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckland, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dowse, Dockery, Driggs, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Grover, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hopkins, Choster L. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Kerr, Ketchum, Kootz, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kerr, Logan, Loughbridge, Ladin, William Lawrence, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Mallory, Mann, Marshall, May, Niblack, Norris, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Pierce, Plants, Poland, Polesky, Pomeroy, Randall, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twitchell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Vidal, E. J. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Window—121.

NAYS—Mr. Van Anken—1.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Bowen, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chandler, Clift, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Edwards, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asabel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kitchen, Knott, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Nunn, Pike, Pile, Price, Prince, Prunty, Raum, Robinson, Root, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Sypher, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—98.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay the bill on the table is lost.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to make a privileged report.

Mr. ROSS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the decision of the Chair was sustained, and lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio as entitled to the floor to make a privileged report.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had passed an act (H. R. No. 553) for the relief of A. W. Ballard.

The message further announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed the bill (H. R. No. 783) for the relief Samuel Pierce.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a privileged question. I submit the following report from the committee of conference on the funding bill:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows: That the House recede from their sixth, eighth, ninth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the tenth and twelfth amendments of the House, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the House, so far as it proposes to strike out words, and agree to the said amendment with an amendment, as follows: insert in lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out the words "as he may prescribe, and of denominations of $100, or any multiple of that sum;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the House, so far as it proposes to strike out words, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: insert in lieu of the words stricken out, "thirty and forty years respectively and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say, the issue of bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent., and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent.;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the House, so far as it proposes to strike out words, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: insert in lieu of the words stricken out, "and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States other than such income tax as may be assessed on other incomes, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: page 1, line twenty-five, (of the bill,) after the word "used" insert the words "par for par."

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the fifth amendment of the House, and agree to the same with the following amendments: page 1, line twenty-eight, (of the bill,) strike out the words "present interest-bearing debt" and insert in lieu thereof the words "present outstanding bonds."

Page 1, line thirty, strike out the words "the three per cent. certificates" and insert in lieu thereof the words "known as the five-twenty bonds;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the seventh amendment of the House, and agree to the same with the following amendment: page 2, lines thirty-three and thirty-four, strike out the words "outstanding or existing obligations as limited herein" and insert in lieu thereof the words "such five-twenty bonds;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from the disagreement to the eleventh amendment of the House, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: insert in said House amendment after the word "negotiation" the word "redemption."

Page 3, line fourteen, strike out the word "or" and after the word "negotiation" insert the words "redemption or exchange;" and the House agree to the same.

They further recommend that the title be amended so that it will read "An act providing for the payment of the national debt and for the reduction of the rate of interest thereon."

JOHN SHERMAN,

E. D. MORGAN,

GEORGE H. WILLIAMS.

Managers on the part of the Senate,

ROBT. C. SCHENCK.

JOHN A. LOGAN.

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a question of order. I ask that the bill, as amended, may be read.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was going to say that I apprehended every one has seen the bill in the morning papers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it has been frequently decided that on a conference report it is not the right of any member to demand that the entire bill be read. That has been decided on appeal. But the Chair understands that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] proposes, as the bill is important, to have it read.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall have to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal because the question has been settled by parliamentary law; it has been repeatedly settled.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I reserve the right to demand a separate vote on each amendment.

The SPEAKER. The rules state that the report of a conference committee shall be voted on and accepted or rejected as a whole. That is the parliamentary law laid down in the Digest, and beyond all controversy. The Chair will read it if gentlemen desire it.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot turn to it at this moment, but the gentleman from Illinois is as well acquainted with the rule as the Speaker is. It is a well-known, established rule that a conference report must be accepted or rejected as a whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to that, but I want the bill, as amended, read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was answering the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS.]

Mr. SCHENCK. It is not my purpose to detain the House with any explanation. The bill is reduced to a little bill of three sections. It has been published in the papers this morning. If there is a general desire in the House to have the bill exactly as we have agreed upon it read from the Clerk's desk, instead of any explanation, I will agree to submit that as my explanation before I call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will have it read.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well. Then I ask that the bill be read as my explanation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to raise the point of order, that it is not in order to read from newspapers here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair certainly cannot sustain that point of order, for it is the practice for members on the floor to read speeches in manuscript and from print.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not understand that the gentleman offered it as his speech.

The SPEAKER. He does. He so stated.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act providing for the payment of the national debt, and for the reduction of the rate of interest thereon.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of $100, or any multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after thirty and forty years, respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin; that is to say, the issue of bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent., and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent., which said bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States other than such income tax as may be assessed on other incomes, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the said bonds shall be exclusively used, par for par, for the redemption of or in exchange for an equal amount of any of the outstanding bonds of the United States known as the five-twenty bonds, and may be issued to an amount, in the aggregate, sufficient to cover the principal of all such five-twenty bonds, and no more.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there is hereby appropriated out of the duties derived from imported goods the sum of $135,000,000 annually, which sum, during each fiscal year, shall be applied to the payment of the interest and to the reduction of the principal of the public debt in such a manner as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury or as Congress may hereafter direct; and such reduction shall be in lieu of the sinking fund contemplated by the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind shall be allowed to any person for the sale, negotiation, redemption, or exchange of any bonds or securities of the United States, or of any coin or bullion disposed of at the Treasury Department or elsewhere on account of the United States; and all acts and parts of acts authorizing or permitting, by construction or otherwise, the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint any agent, other than some proper officer of his Department, to make such sale, negotiation, redemption, or exchange of bonds and securities are hereby repealed.

Mr. SCHENCK. With that explanation, I demand the previous question.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 1363) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, and to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman; when the Speaker signed the same.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The question was on seconding the demand for the previous question on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the funding bill.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House take a recess for fifteen minutes, and I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is not; this is the session of Saturday.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ROSS called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 20, noes 90.

So the House refused to take a recess for fifteen minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion to adjourn for the reason that the two Houses have ordered that the adjournment shall take place at twelve o'clock to-day.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I move that the House now take a recess until eleven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order. The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 19, noes 104.

Before the result was announced

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for tellers on the motion for a recess.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were eighteen in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being not one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion for a recess.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 19, noes 103.

So (one fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Accordingly the motion for a recess to eleven o'clock was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now take a recess until half past eleven o'clock.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 18, noes 100.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. RANDALL called for tellers.

The question was taken; and there were nineteen in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion for a recess.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 19, noes 101.

So (one fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion for a recess until half past eleven o'clock was accordingly not agreed to.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the motion to adjourn for the reason stated by him when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] made a similar motion a few minutes since. The Chair has entertained three motions for a recess in immediate succession, but he doubts whether it was his duty to entertain more than one such motion, in order to determine the status of the House. But the Chair did not desire to deprive the minority of any of their rights, and therefore entertained three motions for a recess. The question now recurs upon seconding the call for the previous question upon the report of the committee of conference.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 103, noes 19.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the report of the committee of conference be laid on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 19, noes 101.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. No. 553) for the relief of A. W. Ballard; when the Speaker signed the same.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the funding bill.

The question was upon ordering the main question.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 26, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—88.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. AXTELL and Mr. JOHNSON for the September session, at which time they expect to be on the Pacific coast.

LEAVE TO PRINT REMARKS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask leave to print an explanation in reply to an attack made on a committee of this House in the Senate.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask leave to print some remarks on the treaty with the Osage Indians.

Leave was granted.

[These remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

DUTIES ON COPPER ORES—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order. The SPEAKER. The regular order is the resumption of the consideration of the bill in relation to duties on copper ores. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. ROSS. As the great inquiry has gone through I withdraw the motion.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill (H. R. No. 1459) to relieve Nelson Tift, of Georgia, from disabilities.

No objection being made the bill was read a first, second, and third time, and passed by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEMBERS-ELECT.

Mr. DAWES. I report back the credentials of Simeon Corley, of South Carolina, and P. M. B. Young, of Georgia. These gentlemen have had their disabilities removed by act of Congress, and the committee recommend that they be admitted to their seats on taking the oath prescribed by act of July 11, 1868.

The report was agreed to.

Thereupon Mr. SIMON CORLEY and Mr. P. M. B. YOUNG appeared and were duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by act of July 11, 1868.

DUTIES ON COPPER ORES.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs under the operation of the previous question on the passage of the bill in regard to duties on copper ores.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Chair entertain a motion to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion was made and rejected. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to lay the bill on the table, but he has withdrawn it.

Mr. ROSS. My motion was to reconsider the vote sustaining the Speaker's decision, and to lay that on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood it differently. Does the gentleman insist upon it?

Mr. ROSS. No, sir.

Mr. BANKS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have not been refused on the passage of the bill. The gentleman will state what other question the yeas and nays have been refused on that he desires to reconsider.

Mr. BANKS. On ordering the main question.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays were ordered on ordering the main question, and they were taken, and were not only recorded, but read in full by the Clerk. The gentleman of course understands that an order which has been executed cannot be reconsidered.

Mr. THOMAS. I voted in the affirmative on sustaining the decision of the Chair, which was appealed from by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] I now move to reconsider that vote.

The SPEAKER. That vote was not reconsidered and laid on the table, and the motion is therefore in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Upon that motion I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. PILE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. THOMAS, Mr. PHELPS, and Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 7, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Boles, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckland, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Callis, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dockery, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Goss, Grover, Halsey, Hamilton, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Loughridge, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Niblack, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Pierce, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Randall, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—125.

NAYS—Messrs. Eldridge, Hunter, Mann, Pomeroy, Taber, Thomas, and Van Trump—7.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chandler, Clift, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Dewesse, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Edwards, Ela, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Golladay, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Haughey, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchen, Knott, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Logan, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Paine, Pike, Price, Prince, Pruyn, Raum, Robinson, Roots, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—90.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the House take a recess until a quarter to twelve o'clock.

Mr. SCHENCK. Has not the Speaker decided that that is a dilatory motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that another motion for a recess was not in order, pending the consideration of the funding bill, but this is a different bill.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to inform the gentleman from Ohio that the Speaker has not decided this to be a "dilatory" motion. He did not use that word.

Mr. SCHENCK. Everybody sees that it is.

The SPEAKER. The House voted down three motions for a recess while the funding bill was pending, and it was manifestly the sense of the House to vote upon it without dilatory motions.

Mr. BANKS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would inquire if a message has been received from the Senate extending the session till four o'clock?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BANKS. Pending that question I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, as the gentleman from Massachusetts must know, because the previous question is operating, and the vote by yeas and nays has just disclosed the presence of a quorum.

Mr. BANKS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal on the ground that the gentleman from Massachusetts as Speaker of the House has administered the very same rule, that when the previous question is operating a call of the House is not in order, unless the absence of a quorum is disclosed.

Mr. BANKS. Not under similar circumstances.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 112, not voting 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Beck, Getz, Glossbrenner, Kerr, McCullough, Moreau, Niblack, Ross, Seofield, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Windom—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckland, Buckley, Roderick B. Butler, Calhoun, Chubb, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corvode, Cullom, Delano, Driggs, Eggleston, Eln, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, French, Garfield, Grover, Hamilton, Haughey, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketchum, Koontz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Mann, Marshall, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pierce, Plants, Poland, Polesley, Pomeroy, Prince, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schack, Shanks, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Sypher, Taft, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Tiewhell, Van Aernam, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, and William Williams—112.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Cary, Chanler, Corley, Cornell, Dawes, Deweese, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Edwards, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Fox, Goldaday, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchen, Kitchin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Logan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Peters, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Root, Solye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—94.

So the motion of Mr. BANKS, for a recess, was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment House bill No. 1459, to relieve Nelson Tift, of Georgia, of disabilities.

The message further announced that the Senate had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 619, to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 270) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States; and

An act (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, informed the House that he had approved and signed bills and resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 396) for the relief of Samuel Tibbets;

An act (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 910) for the relief of the grantees of Ann D. Durning;

An act (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions;

An act (H. R. No. 1052) amendatory of an act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, approved June 3, 1868;

An act (H. R. No. 1131) regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases for the protection of officers and agents of the Government, and for the better protection of the Treasury against unlawful claims;

An act (H. R. No. 1363) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, and to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman;

An act (H. R. No. 1447) granting the right of way to certain railway companies over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth;

An act (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869;

An act (H. R. No. 1457) to pay for indexing the tax bill;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 325) relative to the pay of the chief clerk in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to aid in relieving from peonage women and children of the Navajo Indians.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 1459) to relieve Nelson Tift, of Georgia, of disabilities; when the Speaker signed the same.

COLUMBIA DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER. The President of the United States having signed the bill which provides for appointing on the part of Congress directors of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb in the District of Columbia, the Chair, on the part of the House of Representatives, appoints as directors the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] and the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BOYDEN.]

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] on account of service on two other committees, resigns his position as a member of the Committee of Elections, and the Chair appoints to fill the vacancy on that committee, the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. HEATON.]

Mr. BANKS. I call for the yeas and nays on the question of excusing the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] will understand that by the rules, when a member is already serving on two committees, he has the right to decline service on a third.

Mr. BANKS. We are entitled to a vote on the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot obtain a vote on the question, because the rule is positive that when a member is serving on two committees he has the right to resign service on another.

Mr. BANKS. Allow me to say that if it were not for the interruption of the public business I should take an appeal from the decision of the Chair; but under the circumstances I will not appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the rule read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Any member may excuse himself from serving on any committee at the time of his appointment, if he is then a member of two other committees."

The SPEAKER. According to the construction uniformly put upon this rule by previous occupants of the Chair, any member serving on two committees has the right to excuse himself at any time from service on another committee.

Mr. BANKS. He has the right to excuse himself from service on the committee to which he has last been appointed, but not from service on a committee to which he has previously been appointed.

The SPEAKER. In reply to the point last made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Clerk will read the subsequent part of the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"And under the practice, it is sufficient for him to offer such an excuse at any subsequent period of the session."

REPRESENTATIVE FROM GEORGIA.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, both Houses of Congress having, by a two-thirds vote, passed an act relieving of disabilities Mr. Nelson Tift, I am directed by the Committee of Elections to report his credentials as a Representative from the State of Georgia, with a recommendation that he be admitted to a seat in this House upon taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON TIFT presented himself at the Speaker's desk, and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868.

DISCHARGE OF SOLDIERS ACTING AS CLERKS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution in regard to the discharge of certain soldiers from the quartermaster general's department.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read for information, after which there will be an opportunity for objection.

The joint resolution was read. The preamble recites that ninety-four clerks were discharged from the quartermaster general's department on the 25th instant; eighty-three of the number being men who served in the Union Army during the late war; that the purpose of Congress as repeatedly expressed has been to give the preference in the civil service to those who have done duty as soldiers, whenever they are equally efficient with others. The joint resolution therefore requests the Secretary of War so to amend the order by which the discharge was made, as to retain in service by preference, those efficient clerks who have been physically disabled in the military service of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope no one will object to this resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call attention to the fact that the objection comes from the Democratic side of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had appointed Mr. WHYTE and Mr. HENDERSON a committee to join such committee as the House should appoint to wait upon the President and inform him that both Houses are ready to take a recess at twelve o'clock m.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Under the ruling of the Chair no such message is necessary to be passed.

The SPEAKER. Respect to the Senate would require concurrence.

The request of the Senate was concurred in; and the Speaker appointed Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. ELDRIDGE as such committee on the part of the House.

IMPEACHMENT REPORTS.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed five thousand extra copies of the report of the trial of the impeachment of the President of the United States.

CONSUL AT PANAMA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State in regard to the consul at Panama; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH SEGAR.

Leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Joseph Segar.

AMNESTY.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House, acting under a sense of wise discretion and of that magnanimity and dignity becoming a great Christian nation, in furtherance of the harmony, fraternity, and union of our beloved country, request the President to issue a proclamation of complete amnesty for political offenses to all persons engaged in the late rebellion against the United States.

Objection was made.

DUTY ON COPPER ORES—AGAIN.

Mr. BANKS. I demand the yeas and nays on the pending proposition in regard to duty on copper ore.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is not time to take the yeas and nays.

Mr. BANKS. I object to debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask to withdraw the bill.

Mr. BANKS. I yielded to the funding bill, upon the solemn assurance of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] this would not be pressed.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

While the Clerk was calling the roll the hour fixed for taking a recess arrived.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock m. having arrived, by the concurrent resolution of both Houses of Congress the House of Representatives now takes a recess until Monday, September 21, at twelve m.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of citizens of Philadelphia, asking for appropriations for the improvement of St. Mary's river and the St. Mary's Falls ship-canal.

By Mr. O'NEILL: A resolution of the board of directors of the Union League of Philadelphia, suggesting to Senators and members that they use their influence to prevent an adjournment of Congress at this time.

By Mr. PLANTS: The petition of 124 citizens of Athens county, Ohio, for a mail route from New England to Coolville, in said Athens county, Ohio.

By Mr. POLAND: The remonstrance of Frank H. Harris and others, of Brattleboro', Vermont, against the extension of Howe's patent on sewing-machines.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 27, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. FERRY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes, and had appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN of Illinois, Mr. THOMAS D. ELIOT of Massachusetts, and Mr. S. B. AXTELL of California, managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1276) for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1445) to correct an error in the enrollment of the act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1457) to pay for indexing the tax bill;

A bill (H. R. No. 910) for the relief of the grantees of Ann D. Durning;

A bill (H. R. No. 1052) amendatory of an act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856;

A bill (H. R. No. 1447) granting the right of way to certain railway companies over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth;

A bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869;

A bill (H. R. No. 1131) regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases for the protection of officers and agents of the Government, and for the better defense of the Treasury against unlawful claims;

A bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions;

A bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 491) to provide for the appointment of recorder of deeds in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 16) donating a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation for the exclusive use of a public road;

A bill (S. No. 417) to amend an act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by the State of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico;

A bill (S. No. 489) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco;

A bill (S. No. 596) for the relief of Mrs. L. T. Potter;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) to drop from the rolls of the Army certain officers absent without authority from their commands;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 169) appealing to the Turkish Government in behalf of the people of Crete;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 325) relative to the pay of the chief clerk in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to aid in relieving from peonage women and children of the Navajo Indians.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I ask it but for a moment, in order that I may move a reconsideration to get a paper back from the White House.

The motion was agreed to; and after some minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a resolution for the printing of extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Education be printed for the use of the Commissioner, and that fifteen hundred copies of the accompanying documents, or so many of them, not exceeding fifteen hundred, as he may deem proper, be printed and furnished to the Commissioner, either separately or together, as he may elect.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether that relates also to the report on the condition of the schools in this District.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it does.

Mr. HARLAN. There are two separate reports. I desire to have it include the report on the schools in this District.

Mr. ANTHONY. This includes the printing of the accompanying reports or so many as the Commissioner may deem necessary, not to exceed fifteen hundred, and if that came with his report it will be included.

Mr. HARLAN. To make it sure, I move to amend by adding "including the report for the District of Columbia."

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

PRINTING OF LAND OFFICE MAPS.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to offer a resolution in regard to printing the maps accompanying the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I promised Mr. Wilson, the Commissioner, that there should be a vote on that particular item.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator had better wait until the Senate is full. I shall be obliged to divide the Senate on that motion. It will not take any time.

Mr. STEWART. I am afraid I shall not get an opportunity to call it up again.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to its passing, if such be the will of the Senate; but I must ask for a vote upon it. Probably there is a quorum here now.

Mr. STEWART. The Committee on Public Lands examined the subject of printing these maps twice, and think they ought to be printed. It has been before the Committee on Printing, and the Committee on Printing think they should not be printed. I think it very important to have them printed. In the hurry of business the other day there was no vote on this item, and the Commissioner requested me to have a vote upon it. I think the maps very important for carrying into operation the land system, particularly those maps of the States. They show the extent to which the lands have been taken up. They are absolutely necessary in order that immigrants may understand the location of the lands before they go upon them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows :

Resolved, That the five thousand copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1867 ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, and the two thousand copies for distribution by the Commissioner, be accompanied by the Mercatorial map of the world, and separate maps of the several land States and Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not wish to detain the Senate; but, as I have said to my friend from Nevada, when this resolution is acted upon I shall have to divide the Senate. I will do it now or whenever he sees fit. This resolution has been before the Committee on Printing, and the Committee on Printing was adverse to it. It was afterward referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and the Committee on Public Lands are in favor of it. The only objection that the Committee on Printing have to it is the great expense. It will be an expense of at least $60,000 to print these maps; and if we print them it is fair to presume that the House will print a larger number than we do. I have no doubt the maps are valuable, although I must say if the Government is going to enter on the publication of maps they ought to be verified and their authenticity ascertained by the best scientific information. I think the Coast Survey and the engineer department are the departments that should supervise the publication of maps before the seal of the Government is put upon them. I have not sufficient geographical knowledge, and I presume few of us here have, to judge for myself as to the entire accuracy of these maps.

Mr. STEWART. The maps of the States are taken from actual surveys that are in the Commissioner's office. It is a very important thing for a person going into a new Territory or a new State to know what lands are taken up and what are not. It is the most valuable information that can be furnished to immigrants. There is no information that they desire so much, or call for so frequently, as the maps of the States or Territories where there are public lands. No description can be given of those lands equal in value to a map showing where the lands are. I hope the resolution will be passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. A single objection puts it over.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not interpose a single objection. If it is the judgment of the Senate to enter upon this expense I am perfectly willing to take that judgment; but I wish it to be the judgment of the Senate; I do not wish it to be pressed in haste.

Mr. SHERMAN. Only half of a quorum ought not to overrule the action of the Senate when the Senate was full.

Mr. STEWART. They have not made any decision on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate acted on this very question on the report of the Printing Committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that the resolution lie over until a quorum appears, and then if they determine to print these maps I shall be content. I only wish to have the judgment of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to call up a bill that was under consideration on Saturday evening, but not disposed of. It is House bill No. 1458. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] will withdraw his objection to it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1458) to provide for the more economical administration of the government of the several Territories of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand that this principle has been adopted in the appropriation bill, and I withdraw all objection to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. CORBETT. I call for the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows :

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Legislatures of the several Territories of the United States shall meet but once in every two years, and the next meeting of each of said Legislatures shall begin two years from the date of their last sessions, respectively, and no moneys shall be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States to pay the legislative expenses of the several Territories for any other than the said biennial sessions; and the salaries of the Governors of the several Territories of the United States shall be fixed at $2,500 per annum.

Mr. DRAKE. When that bill was before the Senate on a former occasion the attention of the Senate was called to the fact that if passed in its terms as it then stood the Governor of any of the Territories could not in any exigency call the Legislatures of the Territory together. If that is the present purpose of the bill I do not think it ought to pass.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator is entirely mistaken. It is within the power of the Governor to convene the territorial Legislatures. The question of compensation is another thing. They must compensate them for any special emergency occurring out of their local treasury.

Mr. DRAKE. I have nothing to say about the compensation; but as I have heard it read, it does put it out of the power of the Governor of the Territory to call the territorial Legislature under any emergency whatever; and if that is its character, it ought not to pass in that shape. As to the design of the bill, I entirely approve of it; but there ought to be a reservation in it which would admit of the Legislature being called together in an emergency. I ask for the reading of the bill again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. DRAKE. Now, sir, it is perfectly evident from that bill that the Legislature of the Territory cannot be called together by the Governor in any emergency whatever.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know what emergency can arise to make it necessary?

Mr. DRAKE. I cannot undertake to specify any emergency; but certainly those people should not be left without a possibility of their Legislature being called together if necessary.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is the tenor of the present law.

Mr. DRAKE. No, sir; this takes the place of the present law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator is mistaken as to the existing laws on this subject. I do not think that a law has existed anywhere in any Territory giving to the territorial Governor the right to convene the Legislative Assembly, and he never ought to have such a power. I do not believe such a power has ever been exercised in the United States. It ought not to be in the power of the territorial Governor to put the United States to an expense of $50,000 to suit the wishes, views, and interests, of some particular locality or party in the Territory. I understand this law to conform to all the laws that have ever been enacted in reference to the Territories. I do not understand that this power has ever existed in the hands of any Governor of any Territory; and there is no necessity whatever for its existence. Congress legislates for the Territories; and if any great emergency arises we have the same right to pass a law for a Territory that we have for the District of Columbia. There is no necessity for this power, and I undertake to say that if it is put in the bill it will subject the United States to an expense of $250,000 every year more than is necessary for carrying on the business of the Territories.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe we had a Senate bill similar to this, which was somewhat considered. Now we have a bill hurried here from the House, and a great amount of warmth manifested to have it passed at the closing hours of the session, and a very energetic resistance to leaving any power in the territorial governments to convene the Legislatures in any case. I do not know what case this bill is to meet; but the impression in my mind, and a very strong one, is that somebody, probably in the House of Representatives, is very anxious to have a little affair attended to. I have no doubt that this is one of this class of bills which are always coming up mysteriously at the end of sessions of Congress and State Legislatures. I think the best thing we can do with this bill is to let it lie over, and I have no doubt our territorial affairs will go on as they have gone on, with perfect success.

Mr. RAMSEY. This subject has been before the Committee on Territories for a long time, and maturely considered. It is not sprung upon the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I only wish to repeat what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said. This bill was called to my attention with this plausible pretext, that the expenses of the territorial Legislatures were so great that we ought not to put the Territories to the expense of having yearly sessions. As Congress pays the expense there is not any trouble about that. The truth is, the present Legislatures have made certain monopolies which they want to preserve. We are about to have this fall a change of Administration which will upset a good many nice schemes in those Territories. The passage of this bill will prevent either Congress or the Governors that may be appointed for those Territories, with the Legislatures there, from upsetting a great many nice schemes in the way of corporations in those new Territories, which are rapidly growing. As a matter of course, if there is any place where they ought to have repeated and frequent sessions it is in a country where the population is doubling almost every year. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not act upon the bill now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator from Ohio is altogether too suspicious about this bill. Congress passed a bill for Washington Territory some time ago restricting the sessions there to biennial sessions. That is now the law for Washington Territory. The great evil in these Territories is the frequent meetings of these Legislative Assemblies, for they are constantly making changes and making contracts and binding up the country and the people; so that it is impossible when a State government is organized to legislate for the interests of the people. This bill, which proposes to make biennial sessions of the Legislatures, has no such effect as the Senator contemplates. The effect is to keep these men, adventurers, in the Legislative Assemblies of the Territories from making contracts, granting charters to bridges and ferries, and to enterprises of that description, that destroy and cripple the enterprise of the Territories. That is the great evil to be remedied by this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless this bill is to be laid aside I desire to read it and comment upon it. There are three different clauses in this bill, all in one section. It provides :

That from and after the passage of this act the Legislatures of the several Territories of the United States shall meet but once in every two years.

That is plausible enough.

And the next meeting of each of said Legislatures shall begin two years from the date of their last sessions, respectively.

That is, from the termination of their last session; so that it provides for a meeting probably about once in three years. They cannot meet for two years, so that the people of these Territories may not have the power to repeal obnoxious laws put upon them by the present authorities there, and mostly, as my friend from Oregon knows, of a very doubtful political character.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The less they have of them the better.

Mr. SHERMAN. We hope to make an improvement by next March, at least, in that respect. No Legislatures can be convened in these Territories for two years from the close of their last sessions, under this bill. Now, here is a remarkable provision :

And no moneys shall be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States to pay the legislative expenses of the several Territories for any other than the said biennial sessions.

That undertakes to tie up our hands and prevent us from making future appropriations.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is the provision in all the organic acts of the Territories.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; we never tie up our hands from making future appropriations. Here is another provision:

And the salaries of the Governors of the several Territories of the United States shall be fixed at $2,500 per annum—which, with the $1,000 allowed them as superintendents of Indian affairs, increases their salaries $500. Most of them now receive $2,000. It seems to me that we ought not to pass a bill of this kind at this period of the session. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to discharge the Committee on Printing from the further consideration of the resolution offered by me in relation to the Dictionary of Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now I ask the Senate to consider the resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase for the use of each Senator one copy of the fifth, being the latest, edition of Lanman's Dictionary of the United States Congress and the General Government, and one copy each for the offices of the Secretary, of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and of the Postmaster of the Senate.

The resolution was adopted.

SAMUEL PIERCE.

Mr. WILSON. I submitted a motion a day or two since to reconsider the vote postponing indefinitely the bill (H. R. No. 783) for the relief of Samuel Pierce, which had been reported adversely from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office. I move to take it up now for the purpose of having a vote upon it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote postponing the bill indefinitely.

Mr. WILSON. I will hear a statement from the Senator from Connecticut on the subject.

Mr. FERRY. This bill was referred to the Committee on Patents, who investigated it and unanimously reported against the bill. Upon the report being made, instead of moving the indefinite postponement at the time, at the request of the party I left the bill upon the table for a considerable period of time to give him an opportunity to make such further effort as he chose. As the session was drawing to a close I took the bill up one day and had it indefinitely postponed. Since then the Senator from Massachusetts has desired to have another vote, and I have consented that this motion to reconsider should be agreed to, and I shall then renew the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely. The case is one in which the Committee on Patents were unanimously of the opinion that the relief asked for should not be granted. It is for a second renewal of a patent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, to postpone the bill indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH BRITISH AMERICA.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, I desire the Senate to consider the resolution of inquiry which I presented some months since. I wish to make certain amendments that have suggested themselves to me by the newspaper discussion which they have elicited in the weeks that they have been before the public; they are but suggestions of inquiry for the Committee on Foreign Relations, who, I doubt not, will give the Senate and the country their best judgment upon the whole subject.

I cannot be mistaken in saying that the necessity exists for a careful consideration of our commercial relations with British America. When the recent reciprocity treaty terminated in March, 1866, our trade with the Provinces exceeded that with any nation except Great Britain, and was fast increasing—the tonnage of arrivals and clearances in provincial trade amounting in the last year of the treaty to seven million two hundred and eighty-four thousand one hundred and seventy tons. Under the treaty our commerce had increased nearly fivefold in fourteen years, or from $17,000,000 annually in 1852 to $82,000,000 in 1866. As briefly stated by Arthur Harvey, esq., in his prize essay, the history of the negotiation and abrogation of the treaty is as follows:

"For many years after the United States had established their independence, their trade with the Colonies which continued to own allegiance to the British Crown was subject to most galling restrictions. Partial relief was afforded by the convention negotiated in 1830, by Mr. McLane, President Jackson's minister at the Court of St. James; and a further step toward freedom in commerce was taken in 1846, when the American Government secured the enactment of a drawback law. The beneficial results of these measures led to the introduction into Congress, in 1848, of a bill for reciprocal free-trade with Canada in certain articles. It failed to become law, but attention having been thus directed to the subject, the Senate, in 1851, requested the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to it all the information he could gather relating to the commerce of the Provinces with the States. Mr. Corwin selected Mr. Andrews to collect and tabulate the statistics bearing on this trade; and that gentleman's report, transmitted to the Senate in August, 1852, had a most important influence on the subsequent action of the British and American Governments and Legislatures."

Mr. Andrews reported:

"That the free navigation of the St. Lawrence was greatly desired by all those western States bordering on the great lakes, as their natural outlet to the sea."

"That the free navigation of the St. John would be of great advantage to the extensive lumber interest in the northeastern portion of the Union, and that the repeal of the New Brunswick export duty on American lumber floated down that river would be but an act of justice to the lumbermen of that quarter, upon whom it presses severely."

"That without a free participation in the fisheries near the shores of the Colonies the American deep-sea fisheries in that region would become valueless."

"That it would be wise to place the border trade between the United States and the Colonies on a different basis, and under the influence of a higher principle, so as to mature and perfect a complete system of mutual exchanges between the different sections of this vast continent—an achievement not only wise and advantageous, but worthy of the high civilization of the country."

"After much correspondence between the Governments interested, and many debates in the American and colonial Legislatures, in which some opposition to freedom of trade was shown by the Pennsylvania manufacturers and the Maine lumber interest, and much opposition to admit Americans to the coast fisheries was displayed by the maritime Provinces, the British Government gave the Earl of Elgin full powers to negotiate a treaty in accordance with these views, and Mr. W. L. Marcy having been named plenipotentiary by the President of the United States the reciprocity treaty was drawn up. It was done in triplicate at Washington on the 5th of June, 1854. It went into effect in Canada on the 18th of October, and was put into full operation in the States by the President's proclamation of March 16, 1855."

"For several years afterward nothing but satisfaction was expressed at the working of the new arrangements; but when the fiscal necessities of Canada rendered an increase in its revenue necessary, and heavier duties were levied on manufactured goods, the frontier towns of New York State, whose exports of such articles began to decline, complained that the spirit if not the letter of the treaty was being broken. Each successive increase in the Canadian tariff was made the pretext for renewed complaints. The American Government began to act less liberally than they were wont toward Canadian merchants. Heavy consular fees began to be exacted on imports from Canada. Proof began to be demanded that our exports of grain were 'the growth and produce of Canada,' and much of the carrying trade we had begun to enjoy was thus cut off. The Legislature of the State of New York reported that the action of the Canadian Government was unfair, and requested its Representatives in Congress to protect the interests of the Republic from the 'unjust and unequal system' said to prevail. And although this statement was ably answered by Mr. Taylor and the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul, Minnesota, and refuted by Hon. Mr. Galt, then, as now, finance minister of Canada, who pronounced it 'unjustifiable,' a resolution introduced into Congress, by Mr. Ward, in December, 1863, was carried, and the President was authorized to suspend the existing treaty and appoint commissioners to negotiate a new one. Notice was accordingly given in London on the 17th March, 1865, and information thereof reached the Governor General at Quebec on the 3d April."

I have not the materials for a full exhibit of the course of trade since the abrogation of the treaty, but from a carefully-prepared statement of the trade of Boston as published in the newspapers of that city it appears that during the last two years there has been a reduction of from twenty-five to fifty per cent. of this international trade, with a corresponding diversion in favor of England.

The first clause of my proposition would substantially make the commerce of our northern frontier free, except in foreign productions. While the reciprocity treaty of 1854 was in operation, the manufacturers of the United States asked that the freedom of exchange should include their fabrics as well as the natural growth of the respective countries; this I would provide for, and extend the interchange of products subject to a merely nominal duty to manufactures as well as agricultural productions and raw materials.

That the agricultural interest is interested in a renewal of our relations with our northern neighbors will be seen by this statement in the same essay:

"In 1863, we imported from the States four million two hundred and ten thousand nine hundred bushels of wheat, and exported thither one million four hundred thousand. The imports were chiefly at Kingston (three million one hundred and seventy-five thousand fifty-five bushels) and at Sarina, (seventy-eight thousand seven hundred and ninety-five bushels). The exports were principally across the lakes. We also imported two hundred and twenty-five thousand four hundred and thirty-nine barrels of flour and exported four hundred and ninety thousand. Converting these into their equivalents in bushels of wheat, we find that our imports of this cereal from the States were five million three hundred and thirty-eight thousand nine hundred and fifty thousand. Now, we did not import the balance, one million four hundred and eighty-eight thousand nine hundred bushels, because we needed it for food, for we had a fine surplus of our own, and exported to Europe and the colonies one million four hundred and ninety-four thousand three hundred and eighty-four bushels of wheat and two million seven hundred and eighty-three thousand one hundred and fifty barrels of flour; together, eight million nine hundred and sixty-nine thousand three hundred and four bushels of wheat. But it helped to feed our internal commerce, made up fifteen per cent. of our foreign export of this article, and increased the business of our millers—since the figures show that what we imported as wheat we exported chiefly as flour. Besides, sectional benefits resulted, for the price of wheat was rendered uniform in all accessible parts of the country. On the other hand, the price of flour was somewhat reduced to the people of the northern States, who received a portion of their supplies by our cheap freight routes, while the American merchants and forwarders enjoyed the benefit of the trade with the maritime provinces, which consume annually about the same quantity of breadstuffs which we export to the States. In 1863, the lower provinces imported from the United States flour and wheat to the extent of three million six hundred and fifteen thousand two hundred and thirty-two bushels; our exports to the States being, as above given, three million eight hundred and fifty thousand."

"Looking now at the coarser grains, we perceive that we exported $2,260,438 worth of barley and rye, while we imported only $75,793 worth. Similarly the exports to the United States of oats amounted to $2,097,688; the imports to but $17,637. But on the other hand, we imported Indian corn to the value of $975,014, and exported only $39,807 worth. Thus we see that the treaty has had the beneficial effect of enabling the farmers of Canada and the United States to use their lands in raising just that kind of produce for which their soil and climate are best adapted; the Canadians growing oats and barley, the Americans corn. The consumer has consequently had the advantage of cheaper prices than if the farmers of Illinois had been driven to raise oats, and those of Canada corn. So with animals. We exported live animals worth $2,390,799, importing to the extent of $520,835; but we imported meats worth $1,238,923, and exported only to the extent of $256,527. The Canadian farmer, who grows oats, breeds horses and cattle; and the American, who grown corn, converts it into pork."

I do not fear that Canadian manufacturers will have any advantages for the supply of the American market above our facilities for reaching and holding the Canadian market. The rates of labor will constantly be rendered uniform by the migration of the people; the currency will soon be of the same standard; while the organization of our manufacturing industry at great centers of cooperation will long prevent successful competition. The leading argument for a protective tariff, a crowded labor supply, has as fair application to Canada, and I fail to see any good reasons for restrictions on the commerce between the United States and our northern neighbor.

In proposing the second clause I seek to remove any possible confusion from the importation of articles produced under a low scale of excise duties, and I learn that the late Canadian minister of finance deems it quite possible to bring their excise to an adjustment with those rates with which our people will be satisfied when our revenue system is fully revised, for I presume no one anticipates the permanence of our present excise. We all admit that our industry must be relieved from its existing burdens, and that a few duties imposed on luxuries and stimulants, as in England and France, can be made more productive of revenue than the present system.

The third proposition, "that the navigation of the great lakes and of the canals and channel of the St. Lawrence shall be forever free and open to citizens of the United States and Canada," was a wise provision of the treaty of 1854, to which I am not aware that any objection was made. We extend to the Canadian the freedom of Lake Michigan and the use of the Superior ship-canal in exchange for the use by American vessels of the Welland canal and the canals and channel of the Lower St. Lawrence, with its tributaries. I again quote from Mr. Harvey's essay:

"The lakes and their connecting rivers have a coast line of upward of four thousand miles—half British, half American. At numerous points Canada and the States actually indent each other. Here Canadian, there American railroads and canals offer to the joint commerce of the two countries the shortest transit, the cheapest and most rapid means of conveyance from East to West. Here Canadian, there American markets are the best or the most convenient for the people of the neighboring districts to buy or sell in. It has been permissible since 1855 for the inhabitants of either side of the frontier freely to use the facilities afforded by the other, and a trade has grown up which, though before reciprocity it never exceeded $13,000,000 per annum, now averages about forty million dollars, surpassing what the entire foreign commerce of the States was for several years after the beginning of their Government."

In regard to the fourth proposition, "that Canadian vessels in American ports shall be entitled to all the privileges of American vessels in Canadian ports," I would establish the principle of full reciprocity, leaving it to the committee to establish its practical working. It may be obnoxious in some degree to those who wish to keep up restrictions upon our inland navigation for the benefit of the ship-building and ship-owning interest, but the great and permanent necessity of the western producer is cheap transportation, and the general welfare now demands as much competition as possible in the coasting and carrying trade of the lakes. I believe the practical operation of this clause would add ten per cent. to the value of wheat and other agricultural products of the Northwest and the same time that it cheapen them by that much to the eastern consumer in the reduction of freights. Public sentiment in the West is clamorous, and with good reason, for the removal of every obstruction and the enlargement of every facility in this matter of the movement of produce to market. The shores of Superior and Michigan must be made as accessible from the ocean as the Levant and the Crimea are accessible by grain transports through the Mediterranean.

Mr. Harvey concludes his essay with a consideration of the last important article of the treaty:

"That which secures to the United States the right of using our canals, and enables Canadian vessels to navigate Lake Michigan. This, the article which perhaps most deeply concerns the western States, appears to be that which has led to all the agitation hostile to the treaty. Freedom to use our canals, especially on the liberal terms fixed by the Canadian Government, has naturally interfered with the monopoly of transport enjoyed by those of New York State, whose policy has always been to raise as much revenue from tolls as the western producers could be made to pay. Buffalo and New York consequently first took ground against the treaty, and the committee on commerce of the New York Legislature, in reporting against it, plainly showed their animus in the complaint that we have 'built canals and railroads in Canada to compete with American interests,' and 'engaged in fruitless but persistent efforts to divert the trade of the western States from the natural channels it had already formed.' Let the Legislature of New York be answered by that of the State of Illinois. The commissioners from that State, appointed under resolution of the 14th of February, 1863, to confer on the subject of transportation with the Canadian authorities, said in their memorial:

"For several years past, a lamentable waste of crops already harvested has occurred in consequence of the inability of the railways and canals leading to the sea-board to take off the excess. The Northwest seems already to have arrived at a point of production beyond any possible capacity for transportation which can be provided, except by the great natural outlets. It has for two successive years crowded the canals and railways with more than one hundred million bushels of grain, besides immense quantities of other provisions and vast numbers of cattle and hogs. This increasing volume of business cannot be maintained without recourse to the natural outlet of the lakes." "The St. Lawrence furnishes for the country bordering upon the lakes a natural outlet to the sea."

"Our canal system, then, though it may compete with that of New York, does not appear to the representatives of Illinois to be 'hostile to American interests.' We have not yet succeeded in affording so much relief as we could wish to the bursting granaries of the West. Owing to a combination of causes we only transported in 1863 thirteen million three hundred thousand bushels of wheat through the Welland canal, of which but three million three hundred and three thousand bushels passed on down the St. Lawrence; but even this must have been of great assistance to western producers and forwarders. We hope, however, soon to do better than this. We have now but one grain portage railway connecting Lake Erie with Lake Ontario. We hope soon to have three. We contemplate the enlargement of our existing canals, and the construction of another to connect the Georgian Bay more directly with the St. Lawrence, and shall thus endeavor to realize the ardent hopes of the great West, whose future prosperity depends," say the Illinois commissioners, "upon cheap transportation to foreign markets."

Mr. Brega, in his interesting and valuable communication, addressed to Secretary McCulloch, says:

"The resolution calls for information 'as to the nature of the arrangements made for securing to American citizens the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence, and the privilege of fishing in the waters adjacent to Canada.' These questions were embraced in the reciprocity treaty, and consequently upon the repeal of that measure they reverted to the condition existing previous to 1864. No arrangements or understanding have been entered into since the abrogation of the treaty, between the United States and the Government of Great Britain or of Canada with reference to the subjects. But the Canadian Government has seen fit to permit the arrangement practically to continue in force, so far as our citizens are concerned, in the hope, as they avow, that some understanding will shortly be entered into for liberalizing trade between the two countries, and their desire, in the meantime, to do nothing which might bear an unfriendly interpretation. The freedom to navigate Lake Michigan they do not consider as any equivalent."

"Strictly speaking, it can scarcely be said that the

* The value to the western States of each additional facility for transportation cannot be overrated. Each cent per bushel taken off the cost of carrying their produce to market increases the value of their annual crop by $6,500,000; they having raised in 1862 six hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat and corn.

Canadian Government has permitted the arrangement under the reciprocity treaty to continue, as there is really no regulation or 'order in council' upon the subject of the St. Lawrence. Since the termination of the treaty American vessels desiring to pass either to or from the ocean through the St. Lawrence have asked permission in each case of the Canadian Government, and it has in no instance as yet been refused. But the informal manner in which this permission has been given, and the absence of any general regulation upon the subject, evidently shows that the Canadian Government does not desire to have these special permits regarded as precedents, or as in any manner committing the Government in its treatment of the question hereafter, should no general arrangement be entered into with the United States.

"The free navigation of the St. Lawrence is a matter of necessity in the immense growth of the great Northwest. Already the various channels of communication for the produce of that vast territory to tide-water, where it seeks the markets of the world, are crowded beyond their capacity at certain periods. No artificial communications, no matter upon how liberal a scale they may be constructed, will be sufficient for the almost immediate future. Apart from the question of direct trade between the upper lakes and Europe, the existing communication, even with its limited canals, is of the last importance. It is not exaggerating its consequences to assume that even a war for the possession of the right to the natural outlet to our great lakes and the fertile, teeming territory they drain, would be less costly to us, in its consequences, than the loss which the closing of that outlet to our products would entail. And yet, notwithstanding the gravity of this question and the extent of the interests involved, our citizens enjoy the privilege at this moment solely through the liberality of the Canadian Government, without any understanding whatever of an official or even unofficial character, and without the right to enter a complaint if the permission to use that river was refused."

"It is useless to go into tabular statements to show that up to this time the St. Lawrence has not been used to any great extent as an outlet for American produce. It is not necessary to advert to the important indirect influence which the fact of the existence of this great natural outlet has in the cheapening of freights from the West. It is, as it were, a standing menace against the tyranny which a single route might enforce, and operates always as a check in this way. The argument that the St. Lawrence is of little consequence to the trade of the West, because it has not, up to this time, been used as an outlet for our products, might have a degree of plausibility if it could be maintained that the productiveness of the great Northwest had reached its limits, and that the crops of the past were not to be exceeded by the harvests in the future. The growth of the western States is of almost fabulous rapidity, as it is of gigantic proportions, and who can pretend to set limits to its manhood? Even at its present pace, how long will it be before the produce of that region will choke up all existing means of transportation? The day is not far distant when the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence will each be covered by vessels, floating to less favored countries the generous fruits of the boundless prairies, while the railroads and canals within our borders will be burdened also by the overflowing harvests."

"The following is a statement of the length of the St. Lawrence navigation, and the present capacity of the canals connected therewith. The St. Lawrence navigation is two thousand three hundred and eighty-five miles long, and eight canals, of which seven are Canadian and one American, have been built to make it practicable for all its length. The annexed exhibit shows the various distances and the size of the canal locks:

If the productions of the lake States shall increase for the next ten years in the rate observed since 1850, two hundred million bushels of wheat and six hundred million bushels of corn will be moderate statements, with equally wonderful results in the production of provisions.

The State of Minnesota, producing an aggregate of near twelve million bushels in 1867, between thirty and forty bushels to every soul of population, has not brought one twentieth of her area under the plow, and to such a community the utmost freedom and encouragement of navigation eastward and southward to the sea is a most vital question.

The freedom of the Atlantic fisheries and a common system of copyrights, patents, and postages are desirable, and have already been proposed, I learn, in Canada.

In regard to the cession of northwest British America and the stipulations of the seventh article, I propose, for the most part, what would be the free and voluntary course of our legislation if the country west of longitude 90° was our own.

The Hudson Bay Company holds a charter as old as, and very similar in terms, to the well known grants to Lord Baltimore and to William Penn. Neither England nor Canada can ignore the proprietary rights which exist under the grant of that charter, or have resulted from its repeated recognition: nor could we if the territory was freely ceded to the United States.

I would limit the expenditure for a quit claim rather than leave it as an open question after cession.

So with the assumption of the deficit between revenue and expenditure which has produced general dissatisfaction in British Columbia, leading to a strong popular sentiment in favor of annexation to these States.

The only stipulation which would not otherwise be unavoidable from the possession of northwest British America, consists of the assurance which I would make as a part of a continental adjustment of commerce and boundaries in favor of the immediate construction of the Northern Pacific railroad. Sir, such a guarantee, whenever given, will determine the destiny of northwest British America. Let England first move as I have proposed, and the relations of Selkirk and Saskatchewan and Columbia, including Canada, will become fixed and irrevocable as English provinces. But it must be an immediate, ample subsidy, making certain the construction of a continuous railway from Halifax to Puget's sound, north of latitude 49° before 1880.

The railway question is therefore vitally germane to the whole scope of an international treaty. Hence no project is adequate to the necessities of the subject before us unless it comprehends the topics which I have embraced in this resolution. I feel confident that the Committee on Foreign Relations will, on careful consideration, concur in the opinion which I now express.

Mr. President, this resolution assumes that no commercial treaty should be concluded with Canada which does not dispose of our relations with northwest British America. The people of Minnesota were not satisfied with the reciprocity treaty of 1854, but have always favored a commission to adjust the terms of a more comprehensive treaty, and which should be extended to the Territories west of Lake Superior.

Since the cession by Russia of the extreme northwest the public attention turns with increased interest to the intermediate territory. The Selkirk settlement immediately adjacent to Minnesota, a recent migration of miners from Montana to the sources of the Saskatchewan, and the communities of British Columbia and Vancouver's Island, are the only localities where civilized society is established. I might speak of these settlements in some measure from personal observation; but I choose to refer to a communication from Mr. Secretary McCulloch, addressed June 12, 1866, to the House of Representatives, in which after responding to a resolution calling for information of our commerce with Canada, he availed himself of the opportunity to present more distinctly than on former occasions the commercial relations of the western district of British America (a region rapidly advancing in importance) to the United States.

From this document and its inclosures I ascertain that west of the nineteenth degree of longitude, on the western boundary of Canada, there is an immense domain of five hundred and six thousand two hundred square miles, or three hundred and twenty-three million nine hundred and sixty-eight thousand acres—larger than the whole inhabitable area of eastern British America by one hundred thousand square miles, and which in respect to soil, climate, and mineral resources is more suitable for settlement.

The Treasury report enumerates these western districts as follows:

	Square miles.
1. Central British America, inclosed between longitude 90° on the east, the Rocky mountains on the west, and the forty-ninth and fifty-fourth parallels of latitude, and containing the valleys of the Winnipeg, Red, Assiniboin, Swan, Saskatchewan, and other rivers tributary to Lake Winnipeg.....	360,000
2. Athabasca, a block of territory drained by the sources of the river of that name, between 110° and 120° of longitude and 54° and 58° of latitude, recently discovered to be rich in precious metals, and which is described by Sir Alexander Mackenzie and others as quite similar in climate and vegetation to Scotland.....	50,000
3. Sources of the Columbia, in British Columbia, now the scene of great excitement by the discovery of the Big Bend and Kootenais gold fields.....	20,000
4. The valleys of the Frazer and Thompson rivers, in British Columbia.....	60,000
5. Vancouver Island.....	16,200

"It is now well known that northwest of Minnesota the country reaching from the Selkirk settlement to the Rocky mountains, and from latitude 49° to 54°, is as favorable to grain and animal production as any of the northern States; that the mean temperature for spring, summer, and autumn, observed on the forty-second and forty-third parallels in New York, Michigan, and Wisconsin, has been accurately traced through Fort Snelling and the valley of the Saskatchewan to latitude 55° on the Pacific coast, and that from the northwest boundary of Minnesota this whole district of British America is threaded in all directions by the navigable water-lines which converge to Lake Winnipeg. English and American exploration have also established in favor of this district that its average elevation above the sea is far less than in American territory; that the Rocky mountains are diminished in width, while the passes are not difficult; that the supply of rain is more abundant, and the carboniferous and silurian formations are of greater extent than further south, and, owing to the greater influence of the Pacific winds through the mountain gorges and the reduced altitude, that the climate is no material obstacle to civilized occupation.

"It is unnecessary to repeat the narrative of Lord Selkirk's colonization of the Red river of the North. The present community of Selkirk settlement numbers five thousand, and are competent to assume any civil or social responsibility which may be imposed upon them. The accumulations from the fur trade during fifty years, with few excitements or opportunities of expenditure, have secured general prosperity with frequent instances of affluence; while the numerous churches and schools sustain a high standard of morality and intelligence. A district on the Red river from the international boundary at Pembina to the mouth of the river in Lake Winnipeg, and upon the Assiniboin river for a distance of sixty miles west of its junction with the Red river at Fort Garry, has acquired a civil organization under appointments of legislative councilors and magistrates by the Hudson Bay Company, which is officially designated as 'The Colony of Assiniboin.'"

I will not detain the Senate by detailed statements. It is enough to add that the valleys of the Red, the Assiniboin, and Saskatchewan rivers east of the Rocky mountains are in my judgment destined to produce as much wheat as is now produced in European Russia north of Moscow, and that from this region of America there will be an exportation of grain through Lake Superior as important as the commerce in breadstuffs from the Baltic.

Canada and the United States are equally interested in the speedy settlement of these northwestern districts; but, Mr. President, I am constrained to believe that their colonization will advance far more rapidly as States of the American Union than if they are permanently included in the Canadian confederation.

The railway system of the United States is now extended eighty miles northwest of St. Paul, and will soon reach Selkirk settlement; while the nearest railway communication of Canada is eight hundred miles distant.

Then these communities are closely related to Minnesota, Montana, and the Pacific States by mails, express and telegraph lines, and commercial intercourse.

I am not sure that I desire another reciprocity treaty with Canada except on the basis herein indicated of a permanent and adequate arrangement—an exchange for a liberal adjustment of trade and intercourse along the valley of the St. Lawrence and the lakes. Let Canada and Great Britain cede the districts mentioned of their remote and to them inaccessible northwest, to be organized as Territories of our Union, and closely associated with the immediate construction of the Northern Pacific railroad. For I will not admit, Mr. President, not for a moment, that a single railway communication from the Mississippi States to the Pacific States will satisfy the wants of the country along the route of such a communication from Lake Superior to Puget's sound. Wheat-growing Minnesota and Dakota, gold-bearing Montana and Idaho, and the maritime States of Oregon and Washington are rapidly advancing to positions which demand the same recognition of their interests which you have extended to the communities along the track of the Union Pacific railroad. I would bring within the beneficent influence of such an enterprise another cordon of Territories with equal resources by nature, and which ought to have been developed long ago. Nor is this a local interest merely. The nation will receive a thousandfold whatever aid is temporarily extended to the conquest of the wilderness.

India has constructed five thousand miles of railway, and by a guarantee of five per cent. on capital stock has mostly constructed them with a prospect of speedy reimbursement for the advances by Government, and with a wonderful advent of national prosperity.

We of the Northwest have postponed our Pacific railway in favor of a central line; but we have not abdicated. That enterprise was an initiative, a precedent, and with its success now abundantly assured let there be no suggestion of permanent monopoly. We expect and shall claim a just and equal share of Government recognition.

In regard to the specific form of the national aid I will cheerfully concur in any feasible suggestion by the committee.

I had preferred a limited guarantee of five per cent. in the stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, because the public debt would not thereby have been increased, the Government merely assuring an additional expenditure on this account for a few years, never excessive in amount, and certain to cease and finally be reimbursed by the sale of lands, the increase of traffic, and credits for the transportation of the mails and military stores. Such a guarantee or indorsement by the nation would vitalize all the resources of the company, and as the work advances the country would be astonished by the reduction of the actual burden imposed on the Treasury and the celerity with which it will be removed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution indicated by the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. RAMSEY on the 31st of January last:

Resolved. That the Committee on Foreign Relations is hereby directed to inquire into the expediency of a treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, which shall contain the following provisions:

First. That a duty of five per cent. ad valorem shall be imposed upon all importations from Canada to the United States, or from the United States to Canada, being the exclusive production or manufacture of the respective countries.

Second. That the exports duties of the United States and of Canada shall be assimilated by concurrent legislation.

Third. That the navigation of the great lakes and of the canals and channel of the St. Lawrence river and its tributaries, shall be forever free and open to citizens of the United States and Canada.

Fourth. That Canadian vessels in American ports shall be entitled to all the privileges of American vessels in Canadian ports.

Fifth. That the fisheries of the Atlantic coast shall be free to the citizens of both countries.

Sixth. That a common system of laws regulating copyrights, patent rights, and rates of postage shall be extended over both countries.

Seventh. That Canada, with the consent of Great Britain, shall cede to the United States the districts of North America west of longitude 90°, on conditions following, to wit:

1. The United States will pay $6,000,000 to the Hudson Bay Company, in full discharge of all possessory rights and of all claims to territory or jurisdiction in North America, whether founded on the charter of the company, or any treaty, law, or usage.

2. The United States will assume the public debt of British Columbia, not exceeding the sum of $2,000,000.

3. To aid the construction of a railroad from the western extremity of Lake Superior to Puget sound the United States, in addition to the grant of land heretofore made, will guaranty dividends of five per cent. upon the stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company; Provided, That the amount of stock guaranteed as aforesaid shall not exceed $20,000 per mile, and Congress shall regulate the securities for advances on account thereof.

4. The Northwest Territory shall be divided and organized into Territories of the United States, not less than three in number, with all the rights and privileges of the citizens and government of Montana Territory, so far as the same can be made applicable.

Mr. SUMNER. The first words in the resolution ought to be altered. I have no objection to the resolution passing and going to the committee; but it proposes, as I understand, a treaty with Canada. Now, in point of fact, and under the law of nations, there can be no treaty between the United States and Canada. Canada is not a sovereign Power. The treaty must be with Great Britain. If the resolution be altered in that way, that is all I ask.

Mr. RAMSEY. I accept the modification of the resolution.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1363) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1363) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of Eliza Mascher, widow of John T. Mascher;

A bill (S. No. 579) to establish a new land district in the State of Nebraska;

A bill (S. No. 540) to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 209) to incorporate the Evening Star Newspaper Company;

A bill (S. No. 637) to authorize the city of Washington to issue bonds for the purpose of paying the floating debt of the city;

A bill (S. No. 634) granting a pension to Violet Henry;

A bill (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Nancy Smith;

A bill (S. No. 630) granting an increase of pension to Nancy A. Stocks;

A bill (S. No. 606) granting a pension to Robert Watson;

A bill (S. No. 598) for the relief of Mary Scott;

A bill (S. No. 442) granting lands to the State of Nevada to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad to the Colorado river;

A bill (S. No. 472) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security;"

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 147) for the relief of Jonathan S. Turner;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 172) to construe an act entitled "An act to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core;"

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to admit certain persons to the Naval Academy; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia.

A. W. BALLARD.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 553) for the relief of A. W. Ballard, have directed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. It only appropriates about two hundred and seventy dollars, and I ask to have it put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Quartermaster General of the United States to allow and settle the claim of Captain A. W. Ballard, late captain in the one hundred and thirteenth regiment United States colored infantry, for value of lost voucher for corn issued by Benton Stearns, lieutenant twenty-second Michigan veteran infantry, late acting assistant quartermaster at Washington, Arkansas, November 15, 1865, which is now suspended under act of Congress of February 19, 1867.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCIAL REGULATIONS FOR ALASKA.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I rise to a privileged question. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, one of the members of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes, I understand is unwell and has left the Senate Chamber. I therefore move, from the committee of conference, that Mr. MORGAN be appointed on that committee, in order that they may be able to report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN] will be appointed on that committee. The Chair hears no objection.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 1450.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1450) to provide for the more speedy reorganization of the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, and for other purposes. For the better security of persons and property in Texas, Virginia, and Mississippi the constitutional conventions in each of those States heretofore elected under and in pursuance of an act of Congress passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and the special acts of Congress supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof are to be authorized to exercise the following powers in addition to the powers now authorized by law, to make removals and appointments of the officers of the provisional governments in those States respectively; to authorize the provisional governments of those States respectively to remove and appoint registers and judges of elections under those acts of Congress, which registers and judges of election shall not be eligible to any elective office under such provisional governments, and shall observe the provisions of those acts of Congress; to organize and maintain a constabulary force in each of those States for the preservation of peace and to aid in the execution of the laws; to provide by ordinance for the reassembling of those conventions from time to time, and for holding all elections authorized by those acts of Congress, and for ascertaining and declaring the results of such elections, and especially the result of any election which may be held for the ratification or rejection of any constitution which the several conventions may submit to the people of either of those States; and to pass such ordinances not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States as may be necessary to protect all persons therein in their lives, liberty, and property. The special ordinances which may be passed by the constitutional convention of either of the States are to be enforced by the provisional governments of those States until disapproved by Congress or until such State shall have adopted a constitution of State government, and the same shall have been approved by Congress, provided that nothing therein shall deprive any person of trial by jury in the courts of those States for offenses against their laws. The military commanders in each of the States named are to give aid to the officers of the provisional government in preserving the peace and enforcing the laws, and especially in suppressing unlawful obstructions and forcible resistance to the execution of the laws. On the fourth Wednesday after the passage of this act the convention of Mississippi and Virginia are to reassemble, and the convention of Mississippi is to proceed to frame a constitution of State government and submit the same to the people, under and in pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress before mentioned and of this act. The fifth section provides for the repeal of all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act.

Mr. DAVIS. That is a very important bill. I believe it has not been printed. There has been no opportunity to examine it, and there is no time to consider it at this expiring hour of the session. It certainly ought not to be taken up and hurried through now. I therefore move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Several SENATORS. No; no.

Mr. WILSON. I do not care anything about the yeas and nays. I withdraw the call.

Mr. DAVIS. We want the yeas and nays on this side.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Davis, Doolittle, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, and Whyte—7.
NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Warner, Welch, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Vickers—26.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object. I wish the Clerk to send the bill to me. It has not been printed, and I am unable to speak to it without using the manuscript as sent from the House.

The second section of the bill reads as follows:

That the several ordinances which may be passed by the constitutional convention of either of said States as herein provided shall be enforced by the provisional government in such State until disapproved by Congress, or until such a State shall have adopted a constitution of State government, and the same shall have been approved by Congress: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall deprive any person of trial by jury in the courts of said States for offenses against the laws of said States.

Now, Mr. President, that section is one of very extraordinary character, and will undoubtedly lead to gross abuses during the present year. Here is a provision that ordinances passed hereafter by conventions in those several States shall be enforced by the provisional authorities until the future pleasure of Congress shall be known and shall be announced on the subject. It will make no difference what the orders adopted by the convention may be no matter what the subject may be to which it relates, nor its particular character. Whatever it may be it is to be enforced within the State for an unknown, unfixed period of time in the future. Heretofore Congress has reserved to itself the right to disapprove the acts of territorial Legislatures whenever they may conflict with constitutional principles or with public policy. Here, however, beforehand, before we know what statute may be adopted by the convention, we proceed to provide that it shall be law, and that it shall take effect, and that its operations shall continue until some unknown, unfixed time in the future, when Congress may think proper to recall its assent now given in advance without knowledge.

What will be the result? What is probably the very result aimed at by that section? It is that constitutional conventions in certain of those States may by ordinance regulate and control the elections of the present year, the elections which may be held in those States not only upon the subject of reorganizing the reconstructed State governments, but also elections for the choice of presidential electors and members of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. They do not vote at all. The bill prohibits their voting on the presidential election, and they will not vote on the constitution either.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That shows the impropriety of acting in this manner.

Mr. WILSON. There is nothing about elections in it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suppose it applies to the three States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas. That shows the impropriety of proceeding to legislate in the closing hours of the session in this manner. Of course, no one knows what is in that bill except the particular member or members whose attention has been called to it and who have examined its provisions. Of course, I speak at random. So far as the second section is concerned it is general; it makes no distinction between the different States of the South, although in point of fact I suppose its operation would be confined to the three States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, because in them, and in them alone, will there be constitutional conventions held during the present year.

Now, sir, here is a double authority and a double jurisdiction to be set up in those States, confining myself for the present to the second section of this bill. These constitutional conventions by ordinance may decree anything they please relating to the government of the particular States in which they are held. Then all the existing civil authorities in that State are commanded to enforce their ordinances, to accept them as law, to act under them as if they were binding as acts passed by competent authority; and that condition of things is to continue until Congress, at some future time, shall make some change. That is the second section of this bill. At the same time you continue in those States your military jurisdiction. Here are your military commanders, your generals, with their subordinates, armed by your laws with full control over these provisional governments, not only to regulate and control their action, but to change incumbents of offices under those provisional arrangements. Here is a dual system. First, here is a fountain of law and of power lodged in those constitutional conventions, not merely to frame a constitution for the particular State, but to enact any law, regulation, or ordinance, which the convention may please for the control and regulation of civil affairs within the State. Here, then, also is your military commander, armed by your several reconstruction laws with full authority and control within the same jurisdiction. Now, sir, in a case of conflict or of collision, in case of a difference of opinion as to what is politic, or in fact necessary within the State, between the military commander and the constitutional convention, which authority shall prevail? If different rules are presented by these two authorities which rule shall prevail, which shall the people of that State accept as that rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in the State, which is to command the obedience of the citizen or of the subject?

You will remember, Mr. President, that in the case of Arkansas the constitutional convention in that State provided by ordinance how the election should be held in the State, and they provided such regulations that it was impossible that one half, or more, of the inhabitants of the State could vote at all on the question of adopting the constitution. They prescribed such oaths to be administered at the first election and provided that it should be held in such manner and under such conditions that it was impossible that their political opponents should vote at the election. That was done by ordinance, by a regulation which was to obtain only at the first election. Their constitution made very different arrangements for the future after it had once come into existence by the adoption of the people. What was done there? Here was one rule in Arkansas for the adoption of the constitution prescribed by the ordinance of the convention, which disfranchised a large portion of the people of the State and prevented them from voting on the adoption of the constitution, and there was a different rule prescribed by the reconstruction laws and by the military commanders. What took place? The general in command of the district gave notice that the election should not be held under the ordinance of the convention; that it should be held in conformity with the reconstruction laws of Congress. He issued that order; and it was by reason of his interference, and by it alone, that there was any pretense of a fair or a full election in the State of Arkansas. It was by overriding the passionate and unjust ordinance which had been passed by the constitutional convention.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment for a privileged question, to submit the report of the conference committee on the bill now pending in relation to the territory of Alaska, and which it is necessary should be passed at once?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relative to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes, recommend that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he will yield for a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business? I understand that the bill is to be discussed at some length by other Senators; and as there is only an hour and a half remaining it is clear that we cannot pass the bill. If the Senator from Pennsylvania yields, I submit a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator will excuse me. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FOWLER] desires to make some personal explanation, and I will yield to him.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, at this late hour in the session I dislike very much to occupy the time of the Senate. Indeed, sir, I am disinclined to do so on any occasion; and since I have been here I have occupied but very little of the valuable time of the Senate. I would not even, under present circumstances, seek to divert the attention of the Senate from its more important business if I had not been assailed in a very improper and very dishonorable manner, and if the whole power of the House of Representatives had not been brought to bear in the hands of one bad man for the purpose of crushing me and others on this floor. No investigation has been made by the committee appointed by the Senate to examine into certain allegations connected with the impeachment trial, and we are left to ourselves to protect ourselves against these assaults. I wish now to review to some extent a document known as a report submitted to the House of Representatives and signed by one man of the so-called inquisitorial committee, who brought forward and inaugurated the effort to crush out certain members of the Senate who chose to exercise the right of private judgment on a somewhat memorable occasion.

It is a painful duty to be required to vindicate our own reputation against the aspersions of any individual. Men do not readily listen even to one who is necessarily compelled to speak of himself. It is at all times unpleasant for a man of sensibility to obtrude his complaints upon others.

As each individual in society is interested personally in the good reputation of his fellow, it becomes not only his duty to hear patiently but to undertake the vindication of himself. If the slanderer is permitted to pass undetected and unchastised he will soon undermine the foundations of faith and confidence. However unpleasant it may be for me to assume the attitude of vindicating my own honor, it is in a high degree a public duty to my fellow-citizens. They are deeply interested in whatever affects my honor and good name. I would also feel unworthy of the confidence of men if I did not feel bound to protect and defend the good name of my fellow-men.

I may, then, claim the attention and indulgence of such of the Senators as acknowledge in their hearts and manifest in their conduct the obligations due from man to his fellow-man, and more especially those that comprehend the relations of each to the Great Father of all. I may expect to receive the favor of my countrymen who are actuated by a like regard and reverence for the virtues and graces of life.

To understand more clearly the malignity of the efforts of certain men to asperse the reputation of the seven Republican Senators who dared, in the late movement to expel the President from his place and to take possession of it, to exercise the right of private judgment under the solemnities of an oath, it will be proper for me to review rapidly a part of our political history during the last four years.

THE INCEPTION OF MR. JOHNSON'S ADMINISTRATION.

The war closed soon after his Administration began. This threw upon his hands the labor of providing for the care and interests of ten States. They had been a part of the nation, and the war closed by the vindication of the nation's right to this part of her people and territory. To do the greatest possible good to the inhabitants of these States was at once to protect the interest of the Government and to execute its mission there. The Executive saw that no people could be happy or prosperous without the protection of law administered through a regularly organized civil government. To continue the military government over these provinces or States was contrary to the genius of our free institutions. Through the advice and by the approval of his Cabinet and the leading military men in the field he undertook the work of establishing State governments. These governments were organized during the recess of Congress.

It soon became evident to the party that had been instrumental in prosecuting the rebellion that these organizations would restore the rebel party in the South to power and this would reestablish the rule of those who had been unfriendly to the war. It would leave the freedmen in the power of their former masters whom they had aided to defeat in their cherished and desperate effort for independence.

The result of this action of the Executive was regarded by the Republicans as an abandonment of the men who had as a race remained true to the Union in its sublime effort for its integrity and its life. The duty of the nation to protect its friends was imperative. These are some of the considerations that brought out a policy antagonistic to the policy of the Executive, which, in process of time, assumed a definite form and was denominated the congressional policy. The policy of the President rested upon the ideas of the past, and sought no changes in his well-defined political ideas save the one rendered inevitable by the progress of the war, the abolition of slavery. The emancipated man gained only freedom from slavery. He obtained no status in the nation. He was but a fugitive and a wanderer upon the earth.

The opponents of this system, rising above the prejudices of race and the fetters of the past, and under the inspirations of a more glorious and diviner faith, based their policy upon the capacities, rights, and duties of man. They introduced the emancipated race into the great national family and proclaimed him a citizen of the Republic. This was the declaration of the first article of the civil rights bill, a declaration destined to become immortal in our history and in the history of mankind, to take place with the first great principle announced in the Jeffersonian declaration. In that declaration is contained all that is valuable in the congressional policy. The enfranchisement of the colored man is but a logical sequence of citizenizing him, and both follow inevitably from the declaration that he is a man.

It must, in view of the events and teachings of history, be conceded that no such ideas could make their way to universal dominion without a struggle and without seriously alarming the great body of the ruling class among which this reform was introduced. The minds that were wedded to the past and trusted alone to a basis of experience firmly crystalized opposed the introduction of an element that must upturn the firm earth on which they stood and on which their fathers had stood before them. A bitter contest was inevitable over the inception of a new era. In this, as in all past instances, passion was evoked to the aid of principle. Each party put forth its utmost efforts in the achievement of its object. The conflict has thus far been bitter and personal. The most fearful passions, ambition, glory, success, self-defense, took possession of the combatants. Men ceased to reason and to trust to the divine power of thought. The bounds of propriety were passed by each.

False and unmeaning accusations were freely hurled from side to side.

EFFORT TO IMPEACH.

It was in this severe contest that the President was assailed in the House of Representatives and an effort made to impeach him, which failed by a large majority. Up to this period I did suppose that the conduct of the President in reorganizing the seceded States was impeachable, and do believe that generally this effort to impeach proceeded from honorable motives. This general and vague opinion was formed without a careful application of the relation of the facts to the law. It was influenced, I do not doubt, by the dangers to which I saw the Union men and freedmen of the South exposed. The condition of these parties was fearfully misrepresented by selfish and abandoned men who sought place at any sacrifice. Upon closer examination of the case, after the vote of the House on the first effort to impeach, I saw very clearly that if the President was impeachable all his Cabinet and General Grant were liable to the same charge.

It is now apparent to all who have investigated this question that the President was sustained in his action by all the members of his Cabinet. Indeed, what is called the Johnson policy was the policy of his predecessor in all its essential elements. It is perhaps more strictly true that it was the policy of the Secretary of War, who prepared the first draft of the plan for the organization of North Carolina. He presented the plan to the President before Mr. Johnson acceded to the Presidency.

It may be said that these governments were to be provisional only, and that they were only so intended. That does not alter the case, for they became permanent upon the recognition of Congress. If Congress has the power to propose an organization for these States it has the power to adopt the organizations of the President under the plan of Secretary Stanton. If Congress could make its own acts of reconstruction valid it could have made that of the Executive valid.

MY OWN VIEW OF THE SITUATION.

A large part of the American people believed that the action of the President was unauthorized by the Constitution and laws. It must be admitted that the House of Representatives, in their action, did not regard his course without the sanction of law. When the impeachment failed I did suppose there would be an end of this movement. Undertaken by many true and earnest men, as well as by men prompted by ambition, it was checked by the same character of men. A careful review of the case will convince any unbiased man that there were no grounds for such an action. At all events the purposes of those friendly to impeachment should have been accomplished by the judgment of the House. It was unquestionably the judgment of the country. But the efforts of some were not abated and their designs were not changed. Defeat in the first instance only stimulated to watchfulness and whetted their intentions and passions. The visions of future power, the control of the Government and its ample patronage, was not the least consideration that influenced the leaders in the second effort. It is not now the time to characterize the motives and conduct of those men. They were neither numerous nor marked for their prudence, wisdom, moderation, or disinterested patriotism. They were, for the most part, mere politicians, thrown to the surface through the disjointed times, whose interests could best be served by keeping alive the elements of the departing revolution. The great body of the party had no desire, indeed, no cause for vindictiveness and malice. The few were more persistent, ambitious, and determined. These passions worked their way, and finally inaugurated a revolutionary movement that was checked only by the firmness and patriotism of the Senate.

THE TWO POLICIES.

While the friends of progress and reform were aroused to great anxiety lest this opportunity should fail in establishing their ideas, by the persistency and firm will of the Executive it became manifest that it was through that very antagonism that success was attainable. A calm view of the question, and the causes by which reforms are brought about in society will satisfy any person at all conversant with history that no advance is attainable without strong opposition; and the strength of that opposition must be in direct proportion to the advance demanded. So in this case the success of the reform was due more to the Executive than to any one person. He did not so intend. He earnestly and firmly and honestly maintained the opposite view. I do not say that those who opposed the principle of political equality were absolutely so, but they sought to maintain the present state of the institutions and to advance through them to a higher. They would leave the question of the political equality of all races to the judgment and liberality of one. This would have left the steadfast loyalist to the mercy of the enemy of the Government. I became reconciled to the opposition of the Executive as I became satisfied that by no other means could Congress have been pressed forward to complete this great work. I believed that Congress had, under the circumstances, the right and power to consummate the great work of political equality in the States.

THE INFLUENCE AT WORK.

Early in this session, and before the vote was taken in the House of Representatives, I became satisfied that there was more of sectional prejudice and political ambition in the minds of the leading impeachers than of patriotism. The former passion was seized upon to produce the main object of these parties. I will not say that I did read all that passed before me correctly, but I do say that the course pursued by many and the sentiments advanced by one of the leading Senators, and this course, followed by others on the questions touching southern men, convinced me that there was a deep-seated and unreasonable prejudice against all southern men. That so long as men from "former slave States" acted for them and in their interests they might be tolerated, never trusted; but the moment they assumed any independence they were to be destroyed if possible. Now, I do not mean to say that they were to be murdered. No such humane idea ever intruded itself upon them. Their victims were not to be put away to rest in peace forever, but in their vain arrogance, in their inflated vanity, they assumed the almighty power of the destroyer, and determined to make them the outcasts of earth, the wandering vagabonds despised and scorned of all men. It was to be a moral assassination continued through all time for their perpetual gratification. Compared with this vain, wicked pretension the murderer Booth is an angel of mercy. Of this class of men, to the honor of the human race be it said, there are but few, but these few had grown into commanding power. They had infused the poison of their own breasts into the minds of many good men and many bad ones too.

I am aware from personal observation that many honest and earnest people desired the impeachment of the President because they believed he had actually become a rebel in sympathy and conduct; that he intended to inaugurate the success of the rebellion they had done so much to overthrow. No wonder they were jealous of the cause in which they had spent so much blood and treasure. The first-born slain in every household was an argument that would not down at their bidding if they even desired it. They had poured out the blood and treasures of the nation like water to extinguish forever the institution of slavery, and to establish everywhere liberty and political equality. In the beginning they did not see through the whole problem. Still this was the result that an all-wise Providence was all the while bringing about, and which, though late, they began to believe.

MY OWN PRINCIPLE OF ACTION.

Having cherished fondly and devotedly through my life an "ardent and unconquerable hostility to every form of tyranny over the minds" and bodies of men, I had opposed slavery ever and defended the right of every subject of law to his unit of influence in determining the political force that should control his conduct and regulate and protect his rights. The position was not a new one with me. Through all the days of my life I had maintained the principle. When the war-cloud settled upon our whole southern horizon and threatened to deluge the whole land as it did, I saw through the dark present into the bright future and beheld my cherished hopes fulfilled. Still I did oppose what to me was a fearful crime, although through its agency the future was filled with hope. To gain that point the red cloud of war had to be passed with its fields of slain, devastation, and demoralization. It was upon these principles that I, with a few other persons, began the work of reconstruction in Tennessee. It was upon that basis that the work of reconstruction was effected. From the beginning I anxiously desired the complete triumph of my own long hoped for and fondly cherished views.

I may be permitted here to state my own principle of political action. Through life I have asked only for the right of a free expression of opinion. I have opposed alike the influence of the sword and the tyranny of a bigoted and overbearing public opinion coerced by social influences and party machinery. I have relied on the power of thought to enlighten and purify the human soul. It is light and light alone that can effect an enduring and desirable revolution. The sword, the inquisition, tortures, impeachments, are all from the same source, and are alike opposed to the principle of adequate freedom. I could in no case approve of either, unless as the work of predestined fate; then I would submit in reverence, although it would be in sorrow. I do not wish to state that I condemn courts and their judgments; they are, in the present state of society, necessities. They are never to be resorted to unless for the gravest considerations. Reason and justice and charity are alone the altars at which I would have men worship.

It is true that impeachment is a constitutional remedy for great and solemn crimes. It is a remedy that must not be resorted to for "light and transient causes," for mere party purposes. It is a remedy to which no good man will not shudder to resort. It is one before which a patriot of pure and tender sensibilities would stand in awe. I care not how rash he may have been in his expression, how much he may have been embittered and outraged at the course of an incumbent, no considerations short of actual and unendurable crime would permit him to look with dry eyes at such a remedy. To tear from his high place a man chosen by the American people for their first office, when the question could in a short period pass to the people themselves for their own decision, is not to be contemplated in earnest action without clear and unmistakable causes, legal, constitutional causes. When we reflect that the President was acting according to the opinion of a large minority, if not a majority of the American people, and when we again reflect that he may be endeavoring to do his duty honestly and according to the best lights in his power, we should pause and hesitate long to strike a blow that might set all the arteries of the nation bleeding and lay the foundation for the overthrow of all government. In the heat of political conflict, stimulated by considerations of party triumphs and the powerful influences consequent upon the close of the rebellion, for one I should not feel bound to permit any such decisions to influence my opinions of the question that would come before me in the solemn capacity of a judge. There all personal hostility, all political prejudice, all party ties, all selfish considerations must cease. No honorable man could carry them to that sacred place; no individual with the least self-respect could dare intrude his prejudgments into such a position.

SECOND ATTEMPT AT IMPEACHMENT.

It was under the circumstances already described and under a careful review of the past that I approached the consideration of the questions presented by the trial. I had opposed the entire political theory of the Executive. I occupied from the beginning the very advance guard in the party of reform. Its ends had long been cherished as the sacred principle of the life of the Republic. On all public questions I had acted with my party. At this stage of the question I was bound to hesitate and assume an individual and personal responsibility. Each Senator was to become a judge in a court sitting on the character and rights of a human being. His duty was to pronounce justice according to the Constitution and laws.

When the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] endeavored, at the time the question of impeachment was pending in the House, to put through the Senate a resolution prepared by a distinguished member of the House, afterward one of the managers, which would have committed the Senate in advance of trial for conviction, I then refused to vote for that resolution from considerations of delicacy and propriety as well as from the courtesy and duty due to the accused. I will also add that I had been in the House, which appeared to me in the preliminary steps of revolution. The action of the House, the tone and manner of the members, were to my mind alarming in the highest degree. I had passed through a revolution before. I knew what it was to see a whole people infuriated with resentment and maddened with rage. I had seen thousands upon thousands of good, earnest, pacific people carried by a small storming party of revolutionists into the vortex of rebellion. I had before seen and felt the pressure of wild and unbridled passion. I had seen the appeal made to force instead of to reason. I had seen it pour its burning flood over the whole land, consuming and blasting man and the fruits of his toil. I do not mean to say that the great body of the House were not honest, sincere, and truly patriotic. They were so, and all the more dangerous on that account, if stimulated into a revolutionary course. Now, it is evident that the best men of that body were borne down by the force of party machinery and a false public opinion improvised and brought to the Capitol for that purpose.

It was the 21st day of February, 1868, that President Johnson issued an order for the removal of Edwin M. Stanton from the office of Secretary for the Department of War, and on the same day designated Lorenzo Thomas to take charge of the office. This was the immediate cause of the impeachment. Of course it was not the real cause. It was embraced as the occasion for hunting the Executive from his place. It furnished the revolutionists with the very kind of a pretext best calculated to precipitate a violent state of feeling.

The entire series of articles are but consequence of the one and only rational charge in the list, except the tenth article and part of the eleventh. This article the Senate voted by a large majority to dismiss. These articles involved the construction of the "tenure-of-office bill." That construction I had made at the time the bill passed. After mature reflection, aided by the light elicited upon the trial, after the most exhaustive debate, I have seen no reason to modify the judgment I formed upon the passage of the act.

THE TRIAL.

My attention to all that passed was constant and earnest. I am conscious that my course was influenced with the sole desire to do my duty to my country and the accused. I endeavored to look at this question in the light that history must examine it and place its verdict upon it. I have the most satisfactory assurance, a consciousness of having discharged my whole duty, unbiased and unawed by threats of personal danger and still more fearful threats of political and moral and social assassination. I have seen the ambitious and designing balked in their purposes attempt to execute the latter. I have witnessed summer friends "fall like autumn leaves in wintry weather." I have seen men in high places honored and respected, and asking to be crowned with the choicest places in the gift of American freemen, sink into the sewers of meanness and exhibit traits as low as the barbarian. I have not been disappointed, for I knew that they were begotten by mortals. After all it is another assurance to me of the correctness of my political theories, the philosopher is not after all so far removed from the slave as not to be able to say, my brother. Nor, on the other hand, is the gambler so far from the pretentious leader of the Senate as not to excel him in the higher elements of manhood. If the dwellers of palaces would see themselves, let them look into the cottage, the cabin, and still humbler habitations. They would then claim no preëminence.

If I have any one thing that commands my grateful thanks to the Searcher of all hearts for his infinite mercies, it is for that peace of mind and conscious power of self-support that I have gained from my action in this great cause. God is ever on the side of him who is meekly, reverentially, and bravely true to himself. It is a condition of supreme felicity to be alone and see the baser elements of society fall like withered leaves from around you.

I do desire one thing above all others, that in this as it was by far the most important event of my life, as of all those who sat with me, that my fellow-countrymen could know as I do the motives that influenced the men of my party with whom I had the pleasure to act throughout the trial. They did not and do not pretend to any divinity; to any perfectability, but only to an honest desire to perform faithfully their duty.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE TRIAL ON THE USURPERS.

The trial, it is well known, was protracted from time to time for purposes that in after years will constitute the saddest commentary upon American justice ever manifested in our history. The chief agents in this drama, disappointed in all their dreams of future power and rule, tortured by the superior culture and refined intelligence of the opposing counsel who had extinguished forever their vain hopes of professional superiority and power, determined to wreak their vengeance on the men they thought they could prostrate by a charge of corruption. They at once obtained authority of the House of Representatives to establish an inquisition more powerful and cruel than any that ever cursed, oppressed, and degraded Spain. It was supported by all the power and wealth that the most powerful Government on this earth could furnish. The post office was seized, the telegraph office was placed under the command of the committee, writs commanded the presence of any and all witnesses that were demanded, prisons forced the summoned to testify, spies and informers haunted the footsteps of Senators from their chambers through all the avenues of their public and private duty. The proud boast that I am a free American citizen was trampled in the dust, and a worse than Russian despotism reigned in the capital. After weeks of toil and tyranny and meanness and systematic falsehood the author of the inquisitorial report, signed by B. F. BUTLER alone, comes before the country with a statement so foully false that none but the most corrupt and abandoned would dare to mention it with anything but the severest condemnation. He makes two charges against me, that I made a speech on the 10th day of January, 1868, at a meeting of the Union Congressional Committee in favor of impeachment, and that Colonel Cooper had said that he had secured the votes of Senators HENDERSON and FOWLER. He then meanly insinuates the charge of corruption. He and his accomplices invent falsehoods, and then infer willfully and deliberately the filthy slander.

THE SPEECH AT SENATOR MORGAN'S.

Here is the only record ever made by any person of the meeting alluded to. Not a word was ever recorded of a single speech made:

WASHINGTON D. C., January 10, 1868.

A meeting of the Union Congressional Committee was held at the house of its chairman, Senator MORGAN, this evening.

Present — Senators Morgan, Morrill, Thayer, Chandler, Ferry, Corbett, and Fowler; Representatives Schenck, Ames, Kelley, Broomall, Ela, Coburn, Hopkins, Hubbard, Windom, and Clarke.

Senator MORGAN in the chair.

Thomas J. Tullock secretary.

General SCHENCK presented a report from the Executive Committee, which was adopted.

Interesting and earnest remarks were made by General Schenck, Senators Corbett, Chandler, Thayer, Fowler, Ferry, and Morrill, and Representatives Ela, Kelley, Windom, and Hopkins.

After four months Judge KELLEY forged the following report of my speech, preceded by the only extract from the only record in the book which I have already given:

In the course of his remarks at this meeting, Senator FOWLER, of Tennessee, without warrant of precedent by an allusion to Mr. Johnson by any of the speakers who had preceded him, introduced the question of his impeachment, and entered into an argument to demonstrate its necessity, and to show the responsibility of Congress for the sufferings of southern Union men and the murder of so many of them, which he said would be continued as long as we failed to impeach and remove him.

He opened this topic by saying that some of the gentlemen present had differed with him in their estimate of Mr. Johnson and judgment of his purposes, but that experience had probably satisfied them that he had been right. He said he had known him long and well, and let the defects of his character be what they may, he was plausible and unrepentant in his purposes, and had extraordinary power for evil.

That no efficient relief could be given the Union men of the South till he should be impeached and removed—it was very well to send speakers and organizers among them, and to enlighten them on the questions of the day by distributing our publications among them—but that our labors would be ineffectual while Mr. Johnson continued to administer the laws.

That he would as President be able to overthrow such governments as might be established, and that so long as we should fail to do our duty and impeach and remove him from office, we would be responsible for the sufferings and blood of the Union men of Tennessee and the unreconstructed States.

The foregoing embraces an extract from the minutes of the committee, and my recollection of the tenor and phraseology of the remarks of Senator FOWLER, at the meeting of the 10th of January, nor was their tenor exceptional, as in his intercourse with me he had frequently pressed the same views on me, as well as on others in my presence.

WILLIAM D. KELLEY.

We, who were present also at the meeting referred to above, concur with Judge KELLEY in his account of what was said and agreed to there by Senator FOWLER. Senator FOWLER's idea, distinctly set forth and impressed on us, was that we could expect no restoration of peace to the country or enforcement of the laws without the impeachment and removal of Andrew Johnson from the Presidency.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
B. F. HOPKINS,
OAKES AMES,
J. H. ELA,
JOHN COBURN,
SIDNEY CLARKE,
C. D. HUBBARD,
THOMAS L. TULLOCK.

I regret to see the names of OAKES AMES and General COBURN in this company. They were obtained no doubt through the same influence that obtain names generally. They were, I suppose, asked to sign the document.

It will be observed that this meeting took place after the first attempt in the House to impeach, and six weeks before the second was thought of.

It was not until the 21st day of February, 1868, that the President issued his order for the removal of Mr. Stanton, and designated Lorenzo Thomas to take charge of the office. This act was seized upon, as it was a personal quarrel, and like any other similar fight it was well adapted to the purposes of those waiting in anxious hope for some indiscretion or any pretext, less to dispossess the President of his place than to gain possession of it for themselves. I could have passed no opinion on any subject connected with the articles of impeachment actually preferred. If I had advocated the impeachment of the President on other grounds I could not and would not have felt bound to convict him on a different charge, or on any charge whatever, unless from careful examination of the case I had, upon the trial, found him guilty.

This forgery was not sent to me until the evening preceeding the vote on the eleventh article. It was published in the Washington Chronicle on the day that vote was taken, four months after the meeting at Senator MORGAN'S. The date of KELLEY'S forgery is carefully concealed. He does give the date of the meeting, but is cunning enough to conceal the period of his own criminal conspiracy. I leave the country to judge the motive that did induce this man to play this petty trick of a weak and silly knave. I have this declaration to make, that I did not utter one single sentence that KELLEY has coined. He neither gives the spirit, nor the connection, nor the object of my remarks. I did allude to impeachment, but for a very different purpose and in a very different connection. There is no more uncertain thing than a report made by any person after four months, under the pressure of political or partisan bias. What credence is such a report of a political conspirator entitled to under such circumstances?

It is true I did allude, as I have already said, to impeachment, but for this purpose: that as Congress had failed to impeach, and as the President did desire the success of his policy, he would as he had a right secure it if he could; that the Republicans of Alabama must carry that State if they succeeded in any of the States; that it was the duty of the committee to send means and competent speakers to aid in the canvass; that if we failed to carry the State the fault was our own. I felt more disposed to censure the committee than the President. When it will be remembered that the election was to take place in about three weeks, it cannot be believed that I looked to impeachment as a remedy unless the process of impeachment were as simple, undignified, and uncereemonious as the process of expelling a rat from the cellar, unless to cast aside all self-respect, all regard for the delicate propriety due to that high office, as well as to silence all "compunctious visitings of nature," to block up all "access and passage to remorse," to execute the "fell purpose" with dispatch, to seize with heroic courage the cherished diadem, the process of the "expulsion of the President" were resorted to. No such object was in my mind, no such speech was made.

THE INFLUENCE THAT SUCH A SPEECH SHOULD HAVE.

I will say to my fellow-citizens that if I had made the speech and one ten times more decided, and if it had been made upon the very articles of impeachment I would not have felt bound to adhere to it unless upon the trial I had found the President guilty as charged. I would have felt the more deeply my obligation to give the President the benefit of a just and impartial verdict upon his case according to the spirit and words of my oath to render an "impartial verdict according to the Constitution and laws." If I had distrusted my ability to hear his cause with impartiality, I should at once have resigned my place. If any preconceived opinions or any prejudgment had taken place in my mind, or any ambitious desire for place or honor, or any other consideration of which I could not divest myself, I would have scorned to have taken and kept my seat. If any considerations other than a stern and simple regard for a righteous decision had influenced me or seemed to have influenced me I should have shunned the office as I would a poisonous reptile. But I was not placed in any such position. The President was charged under a law that I had voted for and which presented issues not before involved in the political domain. I expressed no opinion on any article involved in the trial of the President until the Chief Justice asked my decision.

MY RIGHT TO SPEAK FOR MYSELF.

I know I say quite enough, and merit chastisement for very much of it as well as for other derelictions; still I do not believe, and those who know me best will not believe, that I have ever committed any offense so heinous as to merit a punishment so cruel, so inhuman, so degrading as that of having KELLEY and BUTLER assigned to make speeches for me. May I not be judged by my own words?

I have one thing in particular here to complain of, and I pray my fellow-citizens to consider it and believe my statement. KELLEY says that I had frequently expressed the same views to him. Now, what I desire to prevent being inferred from this language of his is this: that there was ever any cordiality between us. I never called on Judge KELLEY in my life. I have met him in committee, on the street, and in the Capitol. I have spoken a few words to him with civility. I do not desire to have an impression so mortifying to my own self-respect as that we were ever in sympathy, or that I did not instinctively repel his presence. I desire to make this statement for the benefit of those that I love and that love me. I pronounced him a revolutionary conspirator, and do not think otherwise now. I formed my opinion from his course on the subject of impeachment long before he forged a speech for me.

THE CONNECTION OF THIS WITH OTHER CIRCUMSTANCES.

It must be borne in mind that this forgery of KELLEY was sent to me on the evening preceeding the vote on the eleventh article, and was published the day that the vote was taken in the Washington Chronicle. A few hours after the forgery came to me three persons visited my room to poll my vote. I detected their sinister motives by a false and contradictory statement of one of them, and the arrogance, insincerity, and weak presumption of another. I shall not stop to speak of the ungentlemanly conduct of the chaplain of the company, who seemed thoroughly in the interest of the revolutionary leaders. These men left disappointed. I met the reverend meddler the next morning in the Capitol, and he threatened the investigation of the inquisition, the exposure and expulsion from the Senate. I will only add that the same threat had been made before by others.

When BUTLER makes his report he inserts KELLEY'S forged speech, and baldly pronounces it an "extract from the minutes of the Union congressional committee." This misrepresentation of KELLEY'S forgery is of itself enough to damn this man to infamy among all honorable men. KELLEY did not date his forgery, and connected the false report with the extract from the minutes of the committee in such a manner as to insinuate the lie. But BUTLER, of more capacious soul and bolder wing for the false, scorns the act of his meaner rival, and baldly proclaims the forgery an extract from the minutes of the committee. He is a bold genius that rises above the dusty and tortuous paths of the common sneak. He mounts upon strong pinions high up in the atmosphere of never-ending and uncontaminated falsehood, and basks in his native element. He is a thorough-bred; no trace of truth contaminates his veins or stains his memory. He seeks to perfect the false by eliminating all the true. He is the immaculate and Protean liar of the age, as well as the very "god of thieves."

THE SECOND CHARGE.

I come now to the second evidence of my corruption. BUTLER charges in his report that Colonel Edmund Cooper, of Tennessee, held the following language with one Leggett:

"Mr. Cooper assured Mr. Leggett that in addition to the Democratic vote the President had secured the votes of HENDERSON and FOWLER; and although the latter was embarrassed by some declarations that he had made 'that the President ought to be impeached,' yet he was sure of holding him ultimately."

As Colonel Cooper is well known throughout the South as a gentleman of fine talents and culture, of the highest social position, distinguished for his devotion to his country in her severest trials, of irreproachable integrity and purity of character, I will let him speak for himself. To my letter calling his attention to the report he made the following reply:

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiries contained in your note of the 18th of July, 1868, I beg leave to say that the statement made in the report of Hon. B. F. BUTLER, that "Mr. Cooper assured Mr. Leggett that in addition to the Democratic vote the President was sure of the votes of Senators FESSENDEN, GRIMES, and TRUMBULL, that he had secured the votes of HENDERSON and FOWLER, and although the latter was embarrassed by some declaration that he had made, that the President ought to be impeached, yet he was sure of holding him ultimately," is a willful, deliberate, intentional falsehood, coined alone in the brain of the witness.

I never made such a statement in regard to you or Senator HENDERSON to Mr. Leggett or any other person, nor could any language of mine be tortured into such a construction.

At no time did I ever make an effort to secure Senator HENDERSON or yourself. You never informed me that the "President ought to be impeached," nor had I ever heard the statement made by others, nor could I have used language showing embarrassment about a subject of which I knew nothing.

Hoping that you will characterize this willful falsehood as it deserves, and that you will suffer no wrong from the vindictiveness with which you have been pursued,

I remain, very truly, yours,

EDMUND COOPER.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FOWLER, United States Senate.

As the report mentions my name only in these two relations prominently, I do not deem it proper to enter further into the matter, except to state that Hon. H. A. Smythe, soon after the vote on the eleventh article, sent me a telegram congratulating me and those who voted with me on the service we had done our country. This I answered at once, in the presence of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. McCREERY,] who read both. The report further says that one General Eagan won a hat in a bet that the seven who voted for acquittal would so vote. The report says that he swore that he "guessed it." It was not difficult for any person who read the trial to tell how each Senator would vote. Any man who watched from the beginning the vote on all interlocutory and preliminary questions could readily have predicted with almost absolute certainty how each would vote. These votes showed the convictions of the Senators, and showed also their courage to defy the spirit of intolerance that surrounded them.

After all the elaborate system of falsehood used by BUTLER in his report, he has failed to prove any offer ever made, or any attempt ever made, or was ever contemplated to be made to bribe, intimidate, influence, or induce any one of the Senators who voted against impeachment to vote as they did. He has failed to show that a single dollar was raised or used or attempted to be used to influence one of these men. There is not an honest man who has ever read the paper that would not pronounce it false in its conception, false in its statements, and false in its intentions. There is not an honorable man that would not spurn the vile slander, and the vile slanderer from his presence as he would hunt a spy from an army. It is so shameful that it bears only the name of its author already immortal in infamy. To show a fair specimen of the capacity of this national liar, I will insert the letter of General Craig relative to the charges against Senator HENDERSON. General Craig is an ex-member of Congress from Missouri, of high character and unsullied veracity. This letter is addressed to Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM, an old friend. I will venture the prediction that Judge BINGHAM scorns the foul slander and its author. No man who ever sat at the feet of that great and good man, John Armstrong, and received lessons of wisdom and truth from him could either lend his voice to sustain a document so loathsome in itself as this, or to ruin one who drank from the same pure fountain. Indeed, not one of the committee were so lost to self-respect as to permit their names to be connected with this infamous document:

METROPOLITAN HOTEL,
WASHINGTON, June 9, 1868.

SIR: After making several applications through friends to General BUTLER for a copy of the report made by him to the House for the special committee of the managers of impeachment, of which you are chairman, I to-day succeeded in procuring a copy, for which I am indebted to the politeness of General

LOGAN. In commenting upon this remarkable document, I desire in advance to disclaim any intention of attributing to you its authorship or any responsibility for its character. An acquaintance of more than twenty-five years gives me authority for saying that you are incapable of either writing or knowingly sanctioning a report made up of deliberate perversions of truth, and of bald, unblushing falsehoods.

I proceed to notice the report, so far as it connects me with the impeachment trial, in the full belief that you could not have read either the evidence or the report, and protesting that if it had gone out to the world as the individual production of Manager BUTLER, and not as the joint report of yourself, and some other gentleman of high character associated with BUTLER upon the committee, I should not have troubled you or the public with this hasty letter.

I have never indulged in the use of those epithets so generally applied to General BUTLER, among the mildest of which are "Brute," "Beast," "Thief," &c., fearing that in the political excitement of the times his enemies were possibly doing him injustice; nor could I, until now, fully realize the pungeny of the language you once applied to him on the floor of the House of Representatives, that "he had been raised in a bottle and fed with a spoon." I can now "see the point," and without investigating the origin of discussing the propriety of the epithets heretofore bestowed upon him, the document now in question conclusively proves him to be "a great liar and a dirty dog."

A note purporting to have been written by Mr. Cooper to the President, stating that "HENDERSON is all right; Lacey has gone to see him with Craig; so says Evans," induced your committee to subpoena me. I attended in obedience to the subpoena, fully determined to answer all questions whatever, proper or improper, which might be propounded, and upon my examination—Generals BUTLER and LOGAN being the only members of the committee present—I did so answer.

In my testimony I admitted that I had visited Senator HENDERSON, but not with Mr. Lacey; that although on terms of intimate friendship with Senator HENDERSON I had never felt at liberty to inquire how he intended to vote on the impeachment until the night before the vote was to be taken; and that the Senator having called at my hotel to bid my family farewell, and I being about to start for Missouri, I then asked him, as I would leave the city within a few minutes, to tell me whether he would vote next day for conviction or acquittal; and that when he informed me of his intention to vote for acquittal I was astonished, for I had offered only a few hours before to bet that he would vote for conviction on one or more of the articles. On my way to the omnibus I met Mr. Lacey on the sidewalk, and told him what the Senator had just communicated to me. This was all that occurred between Lacey and me; and to more completely expose the perversion contained in the report, I will add that I never saw Lacey and HENDERSON together in my life; and in addition to this, Mr. Lacey testified before the committee that he had seen Senator HENDERSON but twice in six years, and on neither of those occasions was impeachment mentioned, either directly or indirectly.

On page 17 of the report appears the following: "Was not the information of Leggett on the morning of the 13th quite correct, that unless the Missouri delegation got HENDERSON'S promise before twelve o'clock, to resign or vote for conviction, they never would get it, as Craig had gone to see him; and they never did." I quote the above paragraph to illustrate the character of the report. This Leggett is the man who confessedly presented a forged letter purporting to come from Senator POMEROY, for the purpose of getting $40,000 for the votes of certain Senators to acquit; and yet BUTLER parades his evidence in his report, apparently with the sanction of the committee, as worthy of belief.

On page 19 the report states that I dined at Welker's with Woolley, Mr. Evans, one of the President's counsel, being also a guest. This is one of the most damnable and willful falsehoods in the report. I have never been in Welker's restaurant, never saw Woolley, do not know him by sight, and I have never been introduced to, nor have I ever spoken to Mr. Evans. This was a plain, palpable, intentional misrepresentation by BUTLER, which needs no further comment.

I have before given the substance of my testimony on the subject of my "seeing and securing HENDERSON." I will add that a day or two after giving my testimony, I called at the committee-room to correct a mistake I had made in my evidence, which I did by writing a note to the clerk of the committee, with General BUTLER'S consent and in his presence. I then told him that justice to the Senate and to the country would be promoted if he would ask me the main question upon the subject which he was ordered to investigate—that is, whether I had used or attempted to use any influence, political, pecuniary, or otherwise, to induce any Senator to vote to acquit the President—and assured him I was ready to swear that I had not done so either directly or indirectly. BUTLER refused to ask the question.

The report states that Lacey's testimony disagrees with mine; that I say I communicated to Lacey HENDERSON'S intention to vote against conviction on Friday evening, and that Lacey states it was on Saturday evening, when, according to my statement, I was far on my way to Missouri. By reference to the testimony of Lacey (question 103, page 16) you will see that no such discrepancy appears, and BUTLER knew his assertion was false when he wrote it.

On the same page the report says I am president of certain railroads in Missouri, in which Mr. HENDERSON is interested. I do not think Mr. HENDERSON owns any railroad stock anywhere, and I know he does not have a farthing of interest in any road or company in Missouri or elsewhere with which I am connected, and no witness before the committee testified that he had any such interest.

Such are a few of the more glaring falsehoods contained in the report. It is unnecessary to specify others. These are sufficient to brand the production with a portion of the infamy pertaining to its author.

To briefly sum up the facts, I will state that I remained in Washington attending to the business of the several railroad companies with which I am connected during the whole time of the impeachment trial, and did not once allude to the subject of impeachment, either in conversation or in writing, to any Senator except to Senator HENDERSON; and I did not try to ascertain his intentions until after the evidence and arguments had been closed, and I was about to leave the city, on the night before the vote was taken; and, although superfluous, I make the assertion that no man acquainted with the character of Senator HENDERSON would have ventured to make any improper or corrupt overtures to him on that or any other subject.

I was a member of the Democratic convention of 1860, at Charleston, South Carolina, where BUTLER voted fifty odd times for Jefferson Davis for candidate for the Presidency. Differing with BUTLER as to the fitness of his candidate, I made certain remarks which I suppose he considered offensive, and it seems he has neither forgotten nor forgiven me. After several southern States had, under the advice of BUTLER, withdrawn from the convention, BUTLER attended the "bolter's meeting," and made a speech in which he promised his fire-eating brethren (in the event of a war resulting from the rupture) the use of half a million northern Democrats to slay the northern abolitionists before they should invade a southern State.

I was disposed at the time to doubt BUTLER'S sincerity, but subsequent events have satisfied me that he would have tried to fulfill his promise if he had continued to believe that the paying side; but after reflecting upon the numerical strength of the northern States, and especially upon the strength of northern safes, he concluded that jewelry and plate were more accessible at the South, and hence took the side of his country, and busied himself during the war in taking jewelry, plate, and other things, instead of taking Fort Fisher, Big Bethel, and other places.

You will not doubt my sincerity when I suggest that you cannot afford to place your hard-earned and well-deserved character in the keeping of this miserable parody on his species. When he charged you with contributing to the murder of an innocent woman, nobody believed him, and the American people read the terrible charge in the Globe with a shudder of indignation; but if you permit him to act as chairman of your committee, bully and badger witnesses, falsify records, manufacture evidence, and finally make a report in the name of your committee that would shock the sensibilities of a buccaner, even your character, heretofore without stain, may be injured.

The only truth I find in the report, so far as it relates to me, is that I was once a member of Congress, and now collector of internal revenue for my district. I voluntarily left my seat in Congress, and will within a week resign the collectorship. For the manner in which I discharged my duties in Congress I refer you to my constituents, and for the kind of "whisky ring" I belong to I refer to the files of the revenue department in this city, and to Hon. E. A. Rollins, the Commissioner.

I am, sir, with high regard, your old friend,
JAMES CRAIG.

Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM.

GENERAL B. F. BUTLER.

Who is this man BUTLER, who assumes to lead the nation by the ears at his will, and to crush out all opposition? He is, I know, not unknown to fame, or rather to infamy. I will call attention to his record, as made by a commission appointed by Mr. Lincoln to investigate the affairs of the department of the Mississippi:

BUTLER IN NEW ORLEANS—PART OF THE STANTON-SUPPRESSED REPORT.

The following is a hitherto unpublished extract from the final report of the "special commission appointed to investigate and report, for the information of the President, upon the civil and military administration in the military department bordering upon and west of the Mississippi."

The order creating this commission was signed by Abraham Lincoln, as President, on the 10th of December, 1864. The commissioners named were Major General William F. Smith, and Hon. Henry Stanbery, of Ohio. General Smith reached New Orleans January 2, 1865, but owing to the non-arrival of Mr. Stanbery, it was not until the 23rd of January that the first testimony was taken. Mr. James T. Brady, of New York, arrived in April, 1865, having been appointed by the President in place of Mr. Stanbery. The report, a volume containing nearly four hundred pages of foolscap, is now on file in the War Office, having been suppressed by Stanton since the time it was submitted, in September, 1865. It is signed by William F. Smith, Major General, (properly known as Baldy Smith;) James T. Brady, and Nicolas Bowen, lieutenant colonel, A. A. G., judge advocate. The commissioners, in their introduction to the report, say:

"The Administration of General Butler in the Department of the Gulf."

"Mr. Jacob Barker was examined on the 9th of February, 1865, and he says, among other things, that when General BUTLER arrived in New Orleans he told the witness he had no money, or very little, in the military chest—about one hundred dollars. Mr. Barker, at his request, loaned him $500, which was afterward paid. About this time he told me (the witness continued) "he wanted more money—$100,000 on his own account for his bill in Boston. I agreed to let him have it. He took the greater portion, for which he gave me his exchange on Boston, which was honorably paid. Of this money most of it he drew on me for gold in favor of his brother. Subsequently he told me that his object in this negotiation was to get funds to loan his brother."

"Mr. B. F. Smith testified before the commission on the 27th of February, 1865, that he had resided in New Orleans twenty-two years, and was there when General BUTLER arrived; that he was interested with Colonel A. J. Butler, the brother of General BUTLER, in carrying goods across the lake, consisting of salt, quinine, shoes, corn, groceries, and liquors, which went mostly into the hands of the rebels, as Colonel Butler well knew. He received one third of the profits realized upon them. The witness was asked: 'Do you believe that General BUTLER knew about this trade?'"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I told him. He asked me the question, and $13,000 worth went after that."

"Question. Did you deal in cotton at all?"

"Answer. We tried to, but got only one hundred and ninety bales."

"Question. State about the transaction."

"Answer. General BUTLER informed me that no more goods should go out unless cotton returned. I went to the rebel authorities. General Lovell, the rebel commander-in-chief, endeavored to have the witness come back with more goods. The witness told him what General BUTLER had said."

"Question. You had no difficulty to get in and out (of our lines) when you pleased?"

"Answer. No, sir; I had six or seven schooners chartered. Colonel Butler got everything fixed. French signed the passes."

"The witness says that when he came back to New Orleans after his interview with the rebel general about the cotton, he reported progress to General BUTLER and Colonel Butler, and that he got a promise, and he says, 'the general told me that the rebels would fool me.'"

"Question. Did the cotton come in?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; and goods went out."

"Question. What was the value of the cargo?"

"Answer. Between twelve and thirteen thousand dollars."

"Question. What was the value of the cotton that came in?"

"Answer. One hundred and ninety-six bales, at forty-five cents a pound."

"Question. When you came to settle with Colonel Butler he gave you only $2,500?"

"Answer. He did not give me that. The party who represented the rebel authorities came to me and offered me $10,000 for my interest in the thing."

"Question. What was the amount of your claim on Colonel Butler?"

"Answer. I do not know; I was to have one third of the net proceeds. We paid for the cotton, I think, ten cents a pound, and got forty-five cents. It was worth about two hundred dollars a bale. That would be about thirty-six thousand dollars. The salt was bringing about thirty dollars a sack."

"Question. How much percentage did you make upon the goods?"

"Answer. More than two hundred per cent., and seventy-five per cent. upon the cotton."

"This witness, Smith, says that he was a rebel at the time, and did not take the oath until after these transactions."

"W. W. Watson testified on the 1st day of March, 1865, that he knew a person named A. F. Smith. (This undoubtedly refers to B. F. Smith, the witness last examined, as will appear by a careful examination of the deposition.) Mr. Watson says that Smith did a great deal of business during General BUTLER's administration; that he would slightly doubt his statements because he was a party in the Bayou la Fourche Land Company bill, which the witness regarded as a swindle."

"The witness testified as follows:

"Question. Is there anything in that to hinder his credibility as a witness, except that he was connected with the straw company?"

"Answer. No, sir; I do not think there was."

"Question. Do you know anything about this business that he carried on across the lake in General BUTLER's time?"

"Answer. At the time I saw him the business was not carried on very well, and he told General BUTLER that he would retire."

"Question. What knowledge had you that he was going into a contraband and improper business?"

"Answer. I had no direct knowledge, but was of opinion that he filled out the General's passes in a written form."

"Question. Do you mean he signed the General's name, or that the General furnished him with blank passes?"

"Answer. I saw his book on the table, and saw his passes that were not signed by the General."

"Question. And you are certain that General BUTLER filled up these passes?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; he cleared three vessels from here to Matamoras, among which was the Mary Davis. When Admiral Farragut was informed of it he sent a gunboat and took the supercargo, Reed, General BUTLER's brother-in-law. Farragut took his pass and went up to the General's with it, and asked him if it was his handwriting, to which the General replied, 'That is A. J.'s handwriting.' A. J. Butler was then arrested and paroled, and afterward taken up by a picket and brought back here, and, having given security in $30,000 bonds, finally ran away."

"The witness was not present at the interview between Admiral Farragut and General BUTLER and based his statement on hearsay. The witness says that the permits which Colonel Butler made out contained a great variety of articles, and instanced one to a man named Long, to take a vessel of about eighty tons to Mobile loaded with provisions, &c. He was to bring back the money belonging to the Merchants' Bank. Colonel Butler and Mr. French made out the list of medicines, and assisted in getting the medicines to send by this vessel."

"The witness was asked: Have you any reason to suppose that General BUTLER was interested in these operations?"

"Answer. Yes, sir. I have reason to suppose so, but I do not know the fact."

"Question. State any fact."

"Answer. They had no money until they got $320,000 out of the city treasury. I saw the first $1,000 counted out on the table in Butler's (Colonel) office."

"Question. Who was present when that money was counted?"

"Answer. No one except Mr. Wyer, Mr. Dunell, and myself. Mr. Dues, General BUTLER, and General Schaffer signed the order. It was presented to Mr. C., and he would not give up the money, whereupon Mr. Mlanders was appointed and the money was got."

"Question. Where any receipts given for this money?"

"Answer. I do not know."

"Question. Was an order ever given to deliver this money over to A. J. Butler?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; and you will find it in the comptroller's office, I think."

"Question. Who signed it?"

"Answer. Dues, General BUTLER, and General Schaffer."

"Question. And it passed into A. J. Butler's hands?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I did not see the money used, but I was asked to pass $20,000 to a planter on the coast, and I told A. J. Butler that I would not do it."

"The witness says that A. J. Butler was engaged in removing crops from plantations to the city, for which purpose a boat used to be guarded by from twenty-five to fifty soldiers, and the boat used to return to the city with six, seven, or eight hundred hogsheads of sugar. He understood, but did not personally know the fact, that this sugar was seized and went to New York through the hands of A. J. Butler. The proceeds of this cargo passed into the hands of A. J. Butler & Co. or their agents."

"The boats employed in the business were the Iberville, Laurel Hill, the Empire Parish, and the Lieutenant Morris, boats in the employ of the United States Government. The Iberville was chartered by Colonel Shaffer and Mr. Bloomer, who did the outside business for BUTLER at $5,000 per month. These boats paid no freight to the quartermaster's department. The witness paid the teamsters and wagoners employed in the work. The boats all passed out of the port of New Orleans free of any charge or tax."

"The witness says: 'I suggested to General BUTLER that the Government transports might be ballasted with sugar. He said that it would not be proper, for the port was not open; but finally that I might do so, provided it was sand instead of sugar.'"

"Question. This was the general himself?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; this was before A. J. Butler arrived here."

"Question. Did you pay to BUTLER any freight upon this ballast?"

"Answer. No; I commenced going around to persons who wanted to ship sugar to New York, and told them that it would be taken for ten dollars a hogshead, and to say that it was sand if any inquiries were made about it. The port was not open until the middle of June, but this sugar was shipped in the month of May. General BUTLER said it would break the blockade in the eyes of foreign Governments if we were found shipping from here before the port was opened. When Colonel Butler came here he sent Captain Turner, and desired an introduction to me. I went down, and he, the Colonel, stated that he had been informed I was the only person capable or willing to do business, and as there was a great deal of shipping to be done, that if I would do it he would furnish officers, stationery, and clerks, and would divide with me. I declined doing so, when he sent for me again, and insisted upon my doing so. I heard him say to the captains of vessels: 'When you arrive in New York lay off in the harbor; go to the quartermaster and get your charter canceled, then heave alongside the pier and discharge your cargo to the consignees, who will pay you two dollars a hogshead. Keep your mouths shut.'"

"Question. What did you engage this freight for?"

"Answer. Ten dollars a hogshead."

"Question. Where did the eight dollars go to?"

"Answer. I don't know. I suppose that the money went to the Government. I charged nothing."

"Question. Into whose hands did these ten dollars pass?"

"Answer. I suppose the Government consigned to the quartermaster, and collected the freight in New York. I suppose everything was proper; I can bring you down to the list of the cargo of every vessel. Colonel Shaffer canceled his bonds by paying $60,000, as they would not bear investigation."

"R. Bloomer was examined before the commission 22d of February, 1865, and testified that he was guardian of the children of one Mr. Wyer, who had an interest in the steamers New Orleans and Southerner, Belle Lee, the Johnnie Rodgers, and the Simpson. During General BUTLER's administration these boats were run on capital, which the witness says was 'probably' furnished by Colonel Butler. Colonel French became interested in them shortly after they arrived in New Orleans. He first became interested in the Southerner. He bought one third, for which he paid $6,000. She paid that one third the first week she arrived; these boats brought the agricultural produce of Louisiana to market. They got into trouble, witness says, every week. They were seized by military authority, and, says the witness, 'it became my duty to get them released. I generally went to Colonel Butler, and he would see persons in authority, and they were generally released.' In the case of the Southerner, she was seized and bonded, and I understood the district attorney discharged it. Sometimes we petitioned that the boat had violated no military law, and General Banks and General Stone would release them. There never was any money paid in any case that I recollect."

Colonel French was the provost marshal general during the administration of General BUTLER."

George Hounnewell, examined before the commission on the 5th of May, 1865, testified that on the 17th of September, 1862, General BUTLER compelled him to sell to him the steamer Nassau, for $31,360 in current funds. He called it $28,000 in greenbacks. He gave me his check on the Citizens' Bank for $31,360, equal to $28,000 in United States Treasury notes. I then offered to charter her to the Government for fifty dollars a day, and if that was too much, they might have had her for forty dollars. He said he was going to send her on a perilous errand, and could not charter her. General BUTLER sold the steamer a few days afterward for $45,000 in greenbacks. He afterward chartered her to the Government for $340 a day; $10,500 a month. I saw the check for the first month's charter."

"Such is the substance of the testimony affecting General BUTLER's administration. For full details we refer to the depositions on file."

This is from the records in the Department of War, and shows conclusively that this general was a traitor to his country, and should have been tried, convicted, and executed for treason. The records of the Government furnish abundant proof of his pillage of the provinces over which he was placed. He went forth for spoils, and through the courage and skill of the brave Farragut he returned crowned with abundance."

THE INFAMOUS ORDER NO. 28.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF GULF, NEW ORLEANS, May 15.

As officers and soldiers of the United States have been subjected to repeated insults from women calling themselves ladies of New Orleans, in return for the most scrupulous non-interference and courtesy on our part, it is ordered hereafter when any female shall by mere gesture or movement insult or show contempt for any officers or soldiers of the United States, she shall be regarded and held liable to be treated as a woman about town plying her avocation."

By command of Major General BUTLER.

GEORGE C. STRONG, A. A. G.

In all the outrages and cruelties of this fearful contest, I venture the assertion that nothing can be found so dishonorable as the above. Other men committed acts of cruelty so starting as to cause humanity to shudder, but this abandoned assault upon the virtue of the women of New Orleans appalls all who dare look at its depravity."

This order was issued upon the trivial provocation given by some of the earnest women of the South to show their devotion to the cause they had espoused with all their hearts, and for which they were willing to sacrifice all that they held dear on earth. This devotion, although erroneous, only elevated these women in the minds of all noble officers and soldiers in the Union Army. It endeared them the more as American women, although in the wrong, still honest and faithful to what they believed their sacred cause. This master in the arts of Mephistophiles, struck home at their honesty and their virtue. It was not in detail but in the wholesale. He commanded his army to tear from their souls all respect for their virtue and purity. It stands out the monument of depravity sublime in its cold atrocity. Let the civilized world read it, and let one man attempt to apologize for it, or to mitigate its worse than barbarous spirit if he dares. It has already met among all civilized people its just condemnation. It is folly to say that the man who was trading with the enemy was moved to this by any sense of respect for his officers, his soldiers, or his country. It was cold revenge for mortified vanity. This man was met with deserved contempt, and he sought his revenge and used his power for that purpose. If, after reading Order No. 28, there are any men that would credit a word that its author would say on any subject, I do not envy them their disposition."

I have mentioned only a few points connected with this individual. The records are full of his atrocities. It was not my wish to assail. I sought not this contest. It was prepared for me, and I could not avoid it; hence I will do no more than I deem proper. I have toiled through too many years of honest conflict to suffer my reputation to be aspersed without an effort to vindicate it. I shall not see myself stricken down in passive submission to a being bloated by his own corrupt and dishonorable passions. Nature says it is so. She has stamped her impress upon him. He is the last and highest expression of treachery and mendacity that has made its appearance.

I shall not further pursue this theme. I will trust my action on the trial to the just judgment of my countrymen, conscious that they will do ample justice to motives, and that they will inflict ample chastisement upon the wicked men who sought to defeat the ends of justice and convert the Senate of the United States into a political guillotine. I have but one wish on the subject, and that is the harmony and peace of my country and the preservation of its institutions. These, I cannot but believe, were endangered by the unhallowed effort made to overawe and coerce the judgment of Senators.

In less than ten years the returning sense of justice of my countrymen will expunge the articles of impeachment from the Journals of the House. Passion, ambition, and vengeance cannot long inflame the masses of men. To their solemn and revered decision I will submit with the same cheerfulness that I have been accustomed to meet all the duties of life.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. President, it is now between two and three months that a committee appointed for that purpose by the House of Representatives has been engaged in an investigation of charges of bribery against members of the Senate in connection with the trial of the impeachment of the President. As one of the Senators who have fallen under the displeasure of the House, and against whom that body has diligently sought proof of corruption, I have repeatedly and earnestly expressed a desire for a most thorough and speedy examination into and report upon these accusations. That desire was amply manifested in the following remarks upon this subject, submitted to the Senate a few days after the final adjournment of the court, in which I denounced the accusations, and demanded an investigation; and for fear of that unnecessary delay and perversion of fact which has ensued I then submitted a resolution to the Senate, in connection with my remarks, for the raising of a committee of its own members, that if possible a more speedy and searching examination might be had:

"Mr. President, since the vote taken in this Chamber on the 16th instant, which resulted in the acquittal of the President of the charge of a high misdemeanor in office, set out in the eleventh article of impeachment, the whole country has been filled with rumors of bribery and corruption on the part of members of this body. Were these rumors confined to street or bar-room gossip they might not be worthy the notice of the Senate; but the House of Representatives has deemed them of sufficient importance to predicate official action on them, and since the date of that vote the board of managers have been in daily session, prosecuting investigations on this subject.

"These charges are calculated to affect the honor of the Senate, and as they have received from the House of Representatives such marked and protracted attention it is becoming in the Senate to take notice of them. An investigation is due from the Senate to its own high character, to its accused members, and to the American people.

"If there be on this floor a Senator who has received or offered or agreed to take a bribe of any nature whatever to convict or acquit the President, let him be proved guilty before a committee of his peers and expelled.

"If there be one who has yielded his convictions to threats, let us expose the coward to the merited contempt and scorn of a courageous people.

"If there be one who has attempted to bully or bribe a fellow-Senator, let us know the fact, and determine whether he is a fit associate for us in this high Council Chamber.

"But if none of these offenses have marred the dignity of this great trial, let the calumnies which the tongues and pens of ten thousand slanderers have scattered broadcast over the land be dispelled, and let the purity and dignity of the American Senate, and of the humblest as well as of the highest of its members, be vindicated by its own act."

"I have borne in silence until now assaults on my character and motives as a member of the court, such as few, if any, of my associates have endured. I do not allude to the fierce storm of party denunciation which burst over the heads of the seven Republicans who voted 'not guilty,' for that was anticipated, and I was prepared for it. The peltings of that storm I have borne with equanimity, conscious that I had performed a just and worthy act, and confident that the developments of time would bring an ample vindication of my conduct against the charges of infidelity to my party and the country. I allude to the charges of bribery in its various forms, now being examined by the managers of the impeachment in secret session. I allude to scandals which have been deliberately concocted by those urging the cause of impeachment, and repeated threats of assassination, all brought with the view of affecting my action in favor of the conviction of the President.

"Believing the trial would soon end, I have thus far submitted in silence to these accusations and assaults, rather than provoke a controversy in the Senate as to matters then pending before the court. But the trial is now ended, and I have something to say in vindication of my conduct during it, which it is both my right and my duty to say.

"At the beginning of the trial of this cause I was sworn by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, as a member of the court of impeachment, to do 'impartial justice to Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, according to the Constitution and laws.' I had been, and still am, an earnest opponent of the reconstruction policy of his administration. I thought, as I still think, that policy in many most important particulars, unwise and injurious to the best interests of the country. I longed, and still long, for such changes in the administration of the Government as would conform it to the views of the dominant party of the country, and to the reconstruction policy of Congress. But I could not, with the light then before me, declare the President guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors on mere differences as to governmental policy. I sought to divest my mind of all party prejudice, hear the accusations and the evidence, and endeavor to cast my vote in the cause with the candor and courage of an honest judge.

"In this spirit I discharged my duty as a member of the court of impeachment. I voted to admit all the evidence offered by both the prosecution and the defense, so that the Senate, sitting as a court and jury, as judges of law and fact, might sift it all and determine the cause with no fact shut out by technical rule which bore on the guilt or innocence of the accused; and when I voted on the several articles of impeachment I cast out of the scale, as far as I was able, all mere party considerations, and weighed the cause as the Constitution and laws and my oath demanded.

"I do not claim the attention of the Senate to-day in order to vindicate the wisdom of my votes. The law and the evidence applicable to the several articles have been ably discussed by the managers on the part of the House, by the counsel for the President, and by the lawyers of the Senate, and any argument from me would be egotistic, superfluous, and now out of time. I ask the attention of the Senate to assert the integrity of my conduct as one of the judges in the trial; to denounce falsehoods set afloat affecting my honor as a Senator; to demand of the Senate that all charges of improper influences brought to bear on Senators during the late trial be openly and thoroughly investigated by the Senate and not be committed to the secret investigation, but public criticism of the board of prosecutors appointed by the House. I challenge any man or board to appear before this Senate or its committee and exhibit accusations or evidence against me; and, finally, to give notice that when that committee is appointed, I shall move the Senate to call on the House for copies of all the testimony taken by its board of managers under the resolution of the 16th instant, so that if any evidence of corrupt practices by or toward any Senator, whether he be one of those voting for or against conviction, be in possession of the board, it may not fail to be brought to the attention of the Senate.

"As a foundation for the charge of bribery brought against me it is claimed that I assured my colleague repeatedly, and up to the day of the vote, that I would vote for conviction on the eleventh article; that he had my pledge in writing to that effect, together with that of thirty-five other Senators; and that I suddenly and unaccountably, except upon the supposition of bribery, changed my determination in a single night. If the assertion of fact were true, the inference were monstrously unfair. Who among you, Senators, anxious to keep his oath and to do impartial justice, was at all times free from doubt? The honorable Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILEY,] in a card published on the 25th instant in the papers of this city, says that he and his colleague were in doubt as to the eleventh article until the week of the judgment, and that he was by the announced opinion of the Chief Justice on the manner of taking the vote on that article to vote for conviction, while his colleague was led by the same opinion to vote for acquittal. I confess, as I am sure a large part of this Senate might truthfully do, to having entertained doubts about that and other articles until a few days before the vote was taken, and I then resolved the question in my own mind by giving to my country the benefit of my doubts. I do not deny that it has been my intention to support a portion of the articles of impeachment, nor that I have given numbers of those who approached me on that subject to understand that such was my intention. But, sir, does that deprive me from changing that purpose when I become convinced that a wrong is to be perpetrated by carrying it out? Is it an uncommon thing for men's minds to be changed with the lapse of time and the further development of the questions at issue?

"But no man ever had from me a positive assurance that I would vote either for conviction or acquittal on that article, or either of the other articles voted on prior to Thursday, the 14th instant.

"That my colleague had no such assurance, but was fully informed of my position upon those articles, will be amply shown upon the investigation contemplated by this resolution by the testimony of Senators on both sides of the question of impeachment.

"Mr. President, I have been no summer soldier, no sunshine patriot. I was baptized in politics in the old abolition party of 1844, when but fifty thousand men in the United States dared to say that they were the friends of the slave, and bore my share of the whips and scorns which fell to the lot of its members before anti-slaveryism became a popular and lucrative profession. I led a colony to Kansas in 1855, and there struggled with success to check the spread of slavery; and again, when rebellion threatened the nation's life, I entered the ranks of the Union Army as a private soldier and carried the flag until slavery was destroyed and the authority of the national Government reestablished. I have never labored or fought for plunder. My hands have no dishonorable stain upon them. No man can point to a single instance where I have wavered in the maintenance of my convictions, whether in the battle's front or the polemics of the forum. Always poor in this world's goods, I have contentedly worked and fought for the establishment of principles which I believed to be beneficent to my fellow-man and to my country; and without egotism I may challenge any honorable Senator here to produce a record of service, in civil or military life, freer to this moment from all stains of selfishness or blot of dishonor than that which I now proudly look back upon and call my own.

"Mr. President, I feel that this charge is heralded over the land and evidence ostentatiously sought to sustain it to make me a scapegoat for the egregious blunders, weaknesses, and hates which have characterized this whole impeachment movement; itself a stupendous blunder from its inception to the present time. I have been singled out as the object of assault, doubtless because I am a new member here, unskilled in debate, unknown to national politics, and comparatively without the means of self-defense possessed by able and more experienced members. I am conscious of these disadvantages, as well as of the strength and malignity of my accusers. They have to-day at their back a large majority of the great patriotic party to which they and I belong, with nearly a lithe machinery of vengeance; while I have but a feeble voice here, backed, however, by that never-failing source of strength, my own consciousness of rectitude and patriotic, honest purpose. Let them do their worst. There is a just people behind us all who constitute the court of last resort, in which all our acts are tried and judged. Dear as I value my hard-earned reputation—the chief property of myself, my wife, and my children—profoundly as I appreciate my weakness and the strength of my accusers, I am upheld by a consciousness of rectitude which no power can shake, and I bid defiance to them and their calumnies.

"Mr. President, I desire to offer a substitute for the resolution now pending.

"That a committee be appointed by the President of the Senate, to be composed of three Senators, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether improper or corrupt means have been used, or attempted to be used, to influence the votes of the members of the Senate in the trial of the impeachment of the President; and that the said committee be authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, and to do all things that in their judgment may be necessary for the furtherance of the object of the resolution."

"That committee, though appointed at my urgent solicitation, has not yet commenced its investigations, and though its members have been repeatedly requested by me to do so I have now no hope that it ever will. At my own request, also, a majority of the committee was composed of gentlemen who were supposed to be actively and zealously in favor of the impeachment, and who were understood to believe the charges of corruption which were so freely and confidently circulated against some who differed with them in that matter.

I had hoped that we would long since have been furnished with a complete report of the operations of this committee, with nothing held back, nothing put down in extenuation of the short-coming of those, if any, who might be found to have been swayed by any influences whatever, from the distinctive line of senatorial and judicial propriety. Up to this time, however, now at the close of the session, no such report has been given us. It is true we had laid upon our desks a few days ago a report in part of the testimony taken by the committee of the House, but which in fact consists of little else, after ransacking the mails and telegraphs and carefully collating the gossip of the street and the bar-room for testimony against the accused Senators, after the employment of all the means known to a shrewd and unscrupulous criminal lawyer of the most degraded and remorseless type, after the most shameless distortion and garbling of testimony, even after the employment of perjury, to little else than base and unwarranted innuendo, of garbled extracts and perverted phrases skillfully put together by the practiced hand of a cunning knave.

Not even the chairman of the committee, its legitimate and proper head, signs the report. All save one, as if conscious of the humiliating and pitiful failure of all their travail, and possessing too much self-respect to lend themselves to a task so revolting, long since practically withdrew from the investigation, leaving it to one so well fitted for it by instinct and habit, and have declined to give it the respectability of their names.

Frequent and loud complaint has been made throughout the country, and echoed in this report, of the efforts alleged to have been made by the friends of the President to improperly influence the members of the court during the pendency of the trial, but not one word is said of the efforts made and persisted in during the entire trial, and even after the vote on the eleventh article, to improperly influence the court for conviction. The badgering of Senators who chose to keep their own counsel, and to persist in a determination to give the President a fair and impartial trial, was too well understood for the committee to have been ignorant of it. The threats of political obloquy, and even of assassination if they failed to vote for conviction, borne to the dissenting Republicans by every mail, must, according to the spirit of this report, be considered as among the legitimate and proper influences to be used in such a cause, else why were they not also inquired into? Who can doubt that this investigation, commenced before the court had fairly closed its sitting for that fateful 16th of May, was itself relied upon as one of the instrumentalities for securing conviction on some one of the remaining articles of impeachment? On the morning of that day I was threatened at the doors of this Chamber by two honorable Senators that a vote on my part for other than the impeachment of the President would certainly be inquired into, as it has been. That this rod was sought to be held over me for the manifest and only purpose of forcing me to vote for conviction, and with the connivance of the committee, who can doubt? Who can doubt either that the subsequent prosecution of the investigation was more for the purpose of coercing Senators to vote for the balance of the articles than with any expectation of developing the alleged corruption?

It is a noticeable feature of the report that it commences at the outset with an apology, which is not an honest, manly confession, but halting and lame, for the miserable failure of the investigation, and for the tissue of falsehoods and perversions which the report contains. The author needed not to have so early reminded the reader of this characteristic of his paper, for a very little progress into its labyrinths of falsehood and malice will develop that fact and expose the depths of its wickedness to any but the most prejudiced eye.

The author of the report alleges that money and promises of patronage were used to procure the President's acquittal, yet fails to trace either directly or indirectly to the door of a single Senator who so voted, and jumps to the conclusion that because an effort was made to procure funds for the defrayal of the expenses of the defense it must, perforce, have been used for the corruption of Senators. The report is more charitable, however, when those are involved who voted for conviction. The inquisitors were very far from being as zealous in inquiring into the other side of the case. Why does the author fail to tell us anything of the disposition of the "fabulous sums" which he is understood to have informed a gentleman could be had, if necessary, for the purpose of procuring conviction? Why does he fail to tell us of a certain $100,000 draft, said to have been drawn by himself in the same behalf? It might be instructive to know why he refused to allow a certain witness testifying before the committee to state all that he knew about bribery in connection with the impeachment. A great deal of useful, if unpleasant information might possibly have been obtained in this matter if the investigations of the committee had been pushed in another direction than they were with the same zeal and industry.

It was with the view, in part, of supplying this hiatus that the effort was made to procure an investigation by a committee of the Senate, but that is now denied us, from what motive I am unable to say; I hope from no fear of unpleasant results to others than those who voted against impeachment.

In regard to the promise of patronage for the defeat of the impeachment, if true, there may be two sides to that also. Was it, or was it not, true that the forty thousand offices of the country were farmed out, from the cabinet down to the cross-roads post office, in the interest of a cabal which had predetermined that one set of men should go out of office simply that another set might go in.

Upon the pretext of explaining the relations of Mr. Perry Fuller with Senators, and the alleged influence he was thereby enabled to exert on the result of the trial, the report proceeds to say, on page 4, that—

"The closest intimacy and family relations have existed and still exist between Fuller and Ross. Fuller is the son-in-law of the person whose Senator Ross lodges, and that Senator Ross was visited by Fuller on the evening before the vote was taken on the eleventh article, and that Senator Ross took breakfast at Mr. Fuller's on the morning of that vote."

If anything were needed to establish the title of the author of this report to the well-earned reputation of a retailer of filthy scandals that want is supplied by this extract. Subsequent events transpiring in connection with the impeachment, in which he has added the soubriquet of "persecutor of women" to his many laurels in the various grades of infamy, give point and elucidation to this language of the report. As to Mr. Fuller's visit on the evening named, I am happy to have been the recipient of frequent visits from him, both before and since that time; but what possible reference this or any of those visits had to the matter of the impeachment the report fails to inform us, and I am in utter ignorance. I did, also, breakfast at Mr. Fuller's on the morning of that vote, as I have done many times before and since. These are two of the very few statements of fact contained in the report. What impropriety there was in so doing does not appear. If the author of the report had published the testimony in his possession in relation to the conversation had on that occasion the malignant insinuation which he seeks to convey, yet does not dare to express, would have been utterly refuted, and therefore its publication was doubtless deemed unnecessary. It certainly was unnecessary to the purposes of the committee.

As an example of the commendable and searching thoroughness with which this grand inquisitor has pursued his investigations in this branch of the impeachment, he informs us that I appeared at my friend's table "without invitation." Now, inasmuch as he has given to the world this fact of my departure from the usual etiquette of society, I will take this opportunity to apologize to my early friend, as also to his estimable family, for my apparent rudeness in so important a matter. The world—certainly the inhabitants of this capital, owe the author of this report a debt of gratitude for thus reminding us that an "invitation," even among friends between whom "family relations" exist, is a prerequisite to the enjoyment of hospitality. Otherwise the notorious individual who speaks "for the committee" might at some future time be found an unbidden guest, especially if the household which should be called upon to endure the honor of his presence, should be a little lax in the care of its table ware.

But what this has to do with charges of corruption in connection with the impeachment I am at a loss to divine. Possibly, however, at some future time, upon the publication of the balance of that of which this is only a "report in part," we may hope to be enlightened by this redoubtable hero of the dual stars, conferred by a credulous Congress, more on account of what was expected than anything that had been performed, in exemplification of the Apostle's definition of faith, which he says is "the evidence of things not seen—the substance of things hoped for."

Testimony is introduced in the report to prove that I had expressed a determination to vote for the conviction of the President, and afterward abandoned that determination and voted for acquittal. This is simply not true, either before, during, or after the closing of the case. It is true, however, that up to a late day in the progress of the trial I felt constrained, in deference to the almost unanimous wish of my party, to resolve all doubts of a legal nature (and they pervaded the entire case) in favor of conviction. Notwithstanding this, however, I could not from the first regard the preferment of the articles of impeachment, aside from the legal merits of the case, otherwise than as a partisan mistake; that their successful maintenance could not but result, in view of the pending presidential canvass, in embarrassing complications and probably in disaster. There are forty thousand offices in the Government, for the immediate filling of which an irresistible pressure would at once have been created, and a scramble for office would have been witnessed never equaled except upon the quadrennial change of administration, accompanied by a change of party supremacy. It is well known that Presidents are seldom so weak as upon the elections next succeeding their inauguration. The reason is obvious. The great bulk of the swarm of place hunters who invariably besiege the incoming President are of course disappointed in their expectations and demands for the recognition of their services to their party by official preferment. The result is disaffection and apathy, and often a serious diminution of party strength in the next succeeding elections. This would have been most emphatically true in this case. Never before was the brood of hungry cormorants congregated at the Federal capital in anticipation of the deposition of the President and the establishment of a new régime more clamorous and remorseless than during the trial of the impeachment.

To have installed a Republican President and then have failed to satisfy with position nine out of ten of these place hunters, as would certainly have been the case, would have been to send to every part of the country a discontented and demoralizing element, which by its indifference, if not by its opposition, would have proved embarrassing in a canvass which must be brought on before the healing effects of time could have soothed its imaginary wounds.

Add to this prolific cause of defection the immediate assumption of the responsibility for the immense fraud and speculation in the revenue department, which it would have been impossible to have cured till long after the presidential election would have passed, and we would have had a load to carry which no party ever yet successfully carried through a presidential canvass.

To have gone into that election under such circumstances must have been for reasons patent to partisan politicians embarrassing, to say the least, if not fatal; and I have the success of the Republican party too much at heart to consent to any measure which I believe to be destructive of its interests or prejudicial to its success.

For more than a year I have labored earnestly, in my humble way, for the nomination and election of the distinguished patriot and soldier who is now our standard-bearer, and I was not willing to see his success hazarded, or his Administration forestalled, by the creation of an ad interim President, if I could in any just and legitimate manner aid in preventing it. Yet because I have given, as I deemed it, the benefit of the legal doubts in this case to my party and the country, I have been proscribed, and my change of base, as it is termed, is brought forward in the report as conclusive proof of corruption; and an ingenious web of insinuation and falsehood, interspersed with incidental and utterly irrelevant facts, is woven in support of the charge. If I were disposed to retaliate, I might ask what it was that produced the remarkable change from "acquittal" to "conviction" in the minds of several members of "the committee." It is well known that but a few months previous to the institution of the trial the House of Representatives, by a vote of more than two to one, and with the concurrence of a portion of this committee, discarded as frivolous and unworthy of consideration all save one of the very articles of impeachment the adoption of which they subsequently urged with such vehemence and persistency. Here was a decisive, radical change of front on the part of the prosecutors of the President.

Now, if I am to be questioned thus closely, and accused of crime in having changed my views on these identical points, I must be privileged to criticise the same act on the part of members of the committee. I hope these gentlemen were not actuated by any base and sordid motives in their conduct. I do not say that they were to share in those "fabulous sums" which were understood to have been raised for the purpose of procuring conviction. It is hardly possible that they were actuated by any expectation of controlling the immense patronage of the Government which was to have reverted to the disposal of one of the impeaching Senators through their labors. Yet why may not these considerations have actuated them as readily as those whom their eloquence failed to convince of the justice of their cause? No, Mr. President, it was no crime for them to change front on this question, simply because they changed from "against" to "for" conviction. No one has charged that there was any impropriety in that, but all the criminality attaching to a change was on the other side. I voted for acquittal when I was expected to vote for conviction; and straightway "hell is stirred from beneath" in the vain search for proofs of unworthy motives. The Republican party press, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with rare exceptions, has teemed with the most abusive and scurrilous personal attacks; association with me has been deemed disreputable and scandalous. I have been passed by on the street and in these Halls like a leper, with averted face and every indication of hatred and disgust, all for having assumed to myself the same right so readily accorded to the committee of permitting time and a more thorough consideration of the merits of the case to change my views.

Mr. President, I appreciated most fully then, as I do now, that the almost unanimous sentiment of the Republican party was in favor of the conviction of the President, and that every man who chose to resist that sentiment in a political sense took his life in his hand. I can say with a painful realization of its truth that at the time of so voting I had no expectation of surviving, politically, the storm of popular indignation which I felt sure would rage throughout the country, and especially in my own State, intense as its people are in their convictions on all political subjects. I felt most forcibly, in casting the vote I did, that I was with my own hands digging my political grave. That a reversal of the hasty judgment of the hour would eventually come, I felt the utmost confidence, and that history would record the act as it was designed to be, as one calculated to effect the conservation of the highest good of the country, and performed in utter disregard of all possible consequences to myself. I had little expectation or hope, however, that that reversal would come until long after I should have passed out of political life. The long controversy which had been carried on between the Executive and the party which elected him had reached a point when apparently nothing but his deposition could allay the strife. I knew that a vote of acquittal would be followed by a contest between every member so voting and his constituents, the bitterness of which has never yet been equaled in the history of partisan politics. I knew that a vote of acquittal on my part would alienate from me, for a time at least, very many of whose confidence and support I have been so proud. I knew that my motives would be impugned, my acts misconstrued, and myself subjected to unmeasured abuse.

But I saw, or thought I saw, in the conviction and removal of the President upon inadequate testimony, and upon accusations mainly of a partisan character, the establishment of a precedent which would render every future President liable to successful impeachment whenever he found himself in a minority in Congress. I thought I saw the success of that great party of which I have so long been a humble but working member hazarded, if not prevented, in the coming election, and with it the hopes of a speedy and complete restoration of the Union under the reconstruction laws of Congress thwarted and destroyed.

Feeling thus, I determined to brave all and vote my deliberate convictions, founded, as I believed them to be, on considerations involving the merits of the case and the highest good of the State.

Viewing the question thus I felt that it would be cowardly to act otherwise; that I should be untrue to the principles of justice, untrue to my party, untrue to myself, and untrue to the country, if I permitted my judgment to be overborne by party clamor or a dread of party indignation.

It will not do to say that it was my duty to subordinate my individual views to those so earnestly and so clearly entertained by the great mass of the party on so grave a question as this. In the first place, I was sworn to act according to the law and the testimony in the case, while my constituents were not. My own judgment was worth more to me than that of those who were thousands of miles away, and could by no possibility be as thoroughly informed of all the facts as I was expected and ought to be.

In the second place, I was sent here to vote on all questions according to my own best judgment, and not to follow the lead of any one, or any number of my peers, however learned or distinguished they might be. My convictions are my own, and whenever I shall not have the courage and the honesty to follow them I will vacate my seat, and give the people I represent an opportunity to fill it with one who has. Confident that I am right, and that history will vindicate my act, I can well afford to await the calm and unimpassioned judgment of time.

I have never yet cast a vote in this Chamber upon any question which had not the sanction of my deliberate and best judgment, irrespective of merely personal and partisan considerations, and I never will. Party dictation, and the thunders of party indignation, have no weight with me, to swerve me one hair's breadth from the maintenance of my convictions, and I hope never will. I do not question the sincerity or the purity of the motives of those with whom I differed. I believe they also acted according to the dictates of their deliberate and best judgment, but I insist upon the same concession from them to myself, until good reason for a different estimate shall be developed.

Mr. President, there is a matter contained in this report peculiarly personal to myself, to which I owe it to myself to refer. On pages 30, 31, and 32 of the report my colleague is reported as giving the following testimony:

Testimony of Senator Pomeroy.

"Question 1. You are a Senator from Kansas?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question 2. On what terms as to personal intimacy have you been with your colleague, Senator Ross?"

"Answer. On cordial and intimate terms as any two colleagues, perhaps, in the Senate. We never had an unpleasant word."

"Question 3. At any time after the argument was closed in the impeachment trial did you speak to him, or to you, as to his opinions or convictions upon the state of the case, as to the guilt or innocence of the President?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I spoke to him at several times."

"Question 4. Will not you give the conversations from time to time as nearly as you can, commencing after the close of the evidence, and have the kindness to state what was said, who commenced the interview, and all that was said."

"Answer. The most definite conversation in regard to specific articles of impeachment was had five days before the Saturday that we voted, or both on Tuesday and Wednesday before we voted. Our conversations previously had been upon the general question of conviction, and the guilt or innocence of the President."

"Question 5. Please state what that conversation was."

"Answer. The most definite and particular conversation was had in the room of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate."

"Question 6. How came you there at that interview?"

"Answer. I noticed that my colleague had gone in there with Senator TRUMBULL and I followed him in."

"Question 7. What did you find when you got there?"

"Answer. I found Senator TRUMBULL in conversation with him."

"Question 8. On what subject?"

"Answer. The subject of impeachment; I do not know the particular article."

"Question 9. Was it an animated conversation?"

"Answer. It was an earnest conversation, at any rate."

"Question 10. Did Senator TRUMBULL appear to be arguing with him?"

"Answer. He was talking in a continued, earnest strain to him on the subject."

"Question 11. What further took place?"

"Answer. The conversation ceased soon after I went in, or within a few minutes. After Mr. TRUMBULL went out my colleague and myself had the conversation to which I am about to allude. I hold the same paper in my hand now that I held then. [Paper exhibited.]

"Question 12. What is that paper?"

"Answer. It is a list of the Senators as prepared by the Senate; and on this list I had put down the articles that I had made up in my mind to vote for, and several other Senators had done the same voluntarily. From my previous conversations I had also put down several articles which I supposed Mr. ROSS would vote for; and I now came to see if I was right. Those articles, so far as they related to Mr. ROSS, were the first, second, third, eighth, and eleventh. I showed, at that time, Mr. ROSS this paper, and he looked at the whole list and saw how all the Senators, so far as they were known then, had decided to vote. I then asked him if those figures were right so far as related to himself. He said they were right with the exception of the eighth; he had his doubts in regard to the eighth; he was undecided. I said, then, taking my pencil, if he was not entirely clear I would draw a circle around the eighth, which I did, as it now appears on the paper. I then asked him in closing if the eighth being erased, it was then right, as he would vote. He said it was. I then asked several other Senators that I was in doubt about, and they all gave me their answers very freely and very pleasantly, and put down the articles they had decided to vote for and those they had decided to vote against. This was not all completed that day, but it was completed before the day of the vote."

"By Mr. WILSON:

"Question 13. Was that conversation Wednesday?"

"Answer. I am not certain; it was Tuesday or Wednesday."

"By Mr. BUTLER:

"Question 14. Has there been any debate in the Senate since he told you that?"

"Answer. No, sir; none prior to the vote."

"Question 15. Did you see him afterward?"

"Answer. Several times."

"Question 16. Did this question of how he should vote come up for consideration?"

"Answer. Yes, sir. Only on one occasion afterward did he even hint that he might be doubtful on some of these articles. That was Thursday night before we voted, about half past nine o'clock. I had called upon Senator VAN WINKLE in his rooms at the National Hotel. I found there my colleague, Senator ROSS, Senator TRUMBULL, Senator HENDERSON, and Senator WILLEY, with Senator VAN WINKLE."

"Question 17. Will not you state that conversation as nearly as you can, so far as relates to impeachment, giving the general substance?"

"Answer. The general question was whether conviction or acquittal would be carried on Saturday. I claimed from my knowledge of Senators, in reply to Senator HENDERSON, who claimed that from his knowledge, was should be defeated by four votes, that it was not possible. He said it was. I told him that on the eleventh article I had had conversation with a sufficient number of Senators to know, believing they all told me the truth, that we should carry it by one vote, and I appealed to Mr. WILLEY, who sat opposite to me, stating that I made this, because he had told me he should vote for the eleventh article. My colleague at that time united with Mr. HENDERSON and Mr. TRUMBULL in an urgent appeal for postponement, not to take the vote at all. Mr. TRUMBULL was not decided that the President would be acquitted on that article, and therefore he argued for postponement. Mr. HENDERSON assured me that if there would be a postponement the President would reorganize his Cabinet. I said, who will take a place in his Cabinet now? So far as I was concerned, the Cabinet was as good as the President. It was no motive to urge to me, to change the Cabinet. Said I, who will take any office in the Cabinet? Reverdy Johnson, he said, would, and Mr. HOOPER would, Mr. EVARTS would, and he mentioned the name of Groesbeck, whether he mentioned any particular place or not. He designated no particular place except that Mr. HOOPER, of the House, would go into the Treasury. I wanted to know if he had been making arrangements for office while we were trying the criminal. He said he had got it second-hand; he did not say where he got it. Mr. TRUMBULL interfered with some conversation, and Mr. HENDERSON said he had had no conversation with the President, but learned this from other sources, but did not tell the source. My colleague said at that time that I had him down on my paper for some of the articles, and he desired to notify me that he was doubtful on some of the articles. Mr. HENDERSON said I was mistaken also in regard to several other Senators on whom I relied, but did not name them. He said he knew on whom I relied. This paper was not shown to any of them. My colleague intimated no particular article on which he was doubtful, but said if we were pushed to a vote on Saturday I might consider him doubtful on some of the articles.

"Question 18. In the course of the conversation was the position Mr. EVARTS would occupy mentioned?"
 Answer. I understood that it was to be that of Secretary of State. The last conversation I had with my colleague was on Friday evening before the day we voted. He dined with me at my house, and at the dinner table, before the family and others who were present, we were discoursing upon the general subject of what was contained in the articles of impeachment and the fact that we had to vote the next day. My colleague repeated what he had previously said, that he preferred to have it postponed, and wanted I should vote for postponement. When the conversation turned upon the eleventh article he said it was the strongest article of all; he was free to vote for that than any, because it was the strongest article. He said he was in favor of the conviction of the President, and that was the strongest article, in his mind. When he came to leave, at about half past six, I accompanied him to the door. He then said he hoped we would put it off and not vote. I said that would be a question for the majority, and I asked him if he had changed his mind in regard to those particular articles, if we were compelled to vote. He said he had not; if he was obliged to vote he had not changed his mind on that subject, but he preferred not to vote, and discoursed at some little length upon the Administration being entirely accessible to us if we would only hold it over the President's head. That was the last conversation I had till the morning, ten minutes before we voted. I then conversed with him in the presence of THADDEUS STEVENS, of the House. He told me that if we forced the vote on I might consider him doubtful on any of the articles, and hoped that I and others would vote for the postponement. I used the reasons that occurred to me at the time to induce him, if obliged to vote, to vote according to what he had previously told me were his convictions.

"Question 19. How came Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS there?"

Answer. He was passing by the door of the Senate and halted as he saw I was conversing with Mr. ROSS. It was a short conversation; only half a minute or a minute, perhaps.

"Question 20. Do you know your colleague's condition as to property?"

Answer. Only in a general way, not definitely. He is generally understood to have a small property in Lawrence, where he lives. He has a house and village lot.

"Question 21. Worth how much?"

Answer. I should suppose $2,000, perhaps, or in that neighborhood.

"Question 22. Is that all?"

Answer. I have known of his having a claim for a quarter section of land.

Mr. President, it is farthest from my intention or desire to comment upon this testimony, or to characterize it in any manner whatever, but will leave this part of the subject with a simple statement of the facts of the case as they occurred.

The conversation alleged to have taken place in the room of the Sergeant-at-Arms occurred on Thursday, the 14th of May, two days before the vote on the eleventh article. I had passed into the room, where I found Senator TRUMBULL, and fell into a merely casual conversation with him about the impeachment. While so engaged my colleague came in, and after the conclusion of my conversation with Senator TRUMBULL, was about to pass out, when my colleague desired me to remain. We retired to a corner of the room, when he commenced by asking me how I was going to vote on the impeachment. I replied that I did not know—that I should probably vote for some of the articles, and not for others. He then informed me that he was canvassing the Senate—that he had got the names of thirty-five Senators, pledged, every one of them, in their own handwriting, for conviction, and wanted my pledge to make conviction sure.

The idea of polling the Senate in this manner on such a question struck me as rather novel, to say the least, and I desired to see the list. He then produced a yea and nay list, and opposite the names of about thirty Senators were figures indicating the articles upon which they would vote for conviction. Opposite my own name, to my surprise, I found myself set down for conviction on the first, second, third, eighth, and eleventh articles. I had not before seen the list, consequently those figures could not have been in my own handwriting. On examining further I discovered a remarkable similarity in the chirography of nearly all the figures, indicating that the whole was probably guess-work, intended as a fraud with which to entrap me into a written committal for conviction. I then informed my colleague that he had no authority to put me down on the list at all, either for or against conviction; that I should probably vote for conviction on the first article, as that, in my judgment, contained all there was in the whole bill of indictment; that the eighth I should not support, and that as to all the others enumerated, I was undecided; that their fate depended very much on that of the first article. If that were carried, I said to him, these would be very much strengthened thereby, but if that were lost, in my opinion all the others went with it.

These are the precise words used, and nearly all that were used. My colleague then took a pencil and drew it around the eighth article, to indicate that I should not support it, and also made a dot under all the others except the first, to indicate that they were doubtful. I have not seen the list from that day to this, but these marks upon the list can be substantiated by any person who will take the trouble to refer to it.

This was on the afternoon of Thursday. The second interview was on the evening of the same day, at the rooms of Senator VAN WINKLE, at the National Hotel. Senators HENDERSON, TRUMBULL, WILLEY, VAN WINKLE, and myself were there by agreement. During the evening Senator POMEROY came in. In the course of a conversation that ensued between him and Senator HENDERSON, he stated that conviction was certain, as thirty-six Senators had pledged themselves in writing so to vote. I asked my colleague if he counted me among the thirty-six. He answered that he did. I then repeated the conversation and the circumstances attending it that we had had in the room of the Sergeant-at-Arms in the afternoon, and he admitted after some hesitancy that my statement of it was correct. I then assured him that he need not count upon my vote as certain for conviction under any circumstances; that I insisted upon a postponement of the vote, and said to him, after he had repeated that he wanted to know how I should vote, as others were asking him about it, that if any one in the future asked him how I was going to vote, to say that he did not know.

This was substantially all that passed between us until Friday evening, at his own residence. I had called there to procure a copy of the Anthony telegram, which was addressed to us jointly. At this interview not one word passed between us on the subject of impeachment, at the table or elsewhere, until I had gone out upon the steps after dinner, and stood waiting for a street car. He then asked me if I felt about the impeachment as I had expressed myself on the previous evening. I said I did, and was still desirous of a postponement.

This was all that passed between us until Saturday morning, when he met me at the lobby door of the Chamber, and commenced an urgent appeal to me to vote for conviction, suggesting that to vote otherwise would be my political death at home, and also that a vote for acquittal would be investigated on charges of bribery. I assured him that I had determined upon the course I should take, and was prepared to take the consequences. I requested him, also, to say to those who were urging the impeachment that if they forced it to a vote on that day it would certainly be lost, as I was determined to secure a postponement at all hazards.

This is the substance, in fact all the material conversation relating to impeachment, that passed between my colleague and myself during the period covered by his testimony. The misstatements contained in that testimony I can only ascribe to a defective memory, and there I propose to leave it, at least for the present.

This, however, is a fair sample of the entire report so far as it relates to myself, and, I doubt not, so far as it relates to others. That report is a tissue of falsehoods, wilful perversions of facts and distortions of testimony from beginning to end. Having found it false in so important a particular as the case cited, is it not reasonable, without specifying further, to presume the whole to be of the same character?

It will be borne in mind, Mr. President, that the testimony contained in this report was all taken in secret. No information was afforded me as to the charges that were to be investigated, what witnesses or whether any were to be called, no opportunity given for replication or explanation of circumstances that might otherwise be misconstrued, or even that an investigation was to be had. Certainly I may claim it to be due to a Senator that he at least be allowed to know something of a proceeding designed to blacken his character, and degrade him from his high and honorable position, if not to face his accusers and their witnesses. The meanest criminal is guaranteed this by the most sacred and obligatory of our laws.

But nothing of this sort was permitted. That comity which has heretofore been observed between the two Houses of Congress was utterly broken down. The verdict of guilty was pronounced in advance, and then proof diligently sought to substantiate it. No tribunal in the world ever more thoroughly earned the designation of a Star Chamber Inquisition. The merest trifles are caught up and magnified into "proofs confirmation strong," when a single explanatory word would have rendered their use in support of the accusations of the inquisitors utterly ridiculous, and have saved the country the absurd and humiliating spectacle which that committee now presents to the gaze of the country.

What are the American people to think of such a procedure? Nowhere in the world is private and public integrity more general or more highly prized than here. Nowhere in the world are public men so free to act according to the dictates of their own personal reason and judgment. Nowhere in all the nations of the earth is personal independence and manly courage in the maintenance of personal convictions so thoroughly appreciated and so highly honored. How, then, must a brave and courageous people view this insidious and malignant assault upon personal independence and private character by one whom common rumor makes the loathsome embodiment of all the crimes denounced in the decalogue; by one who, it is believed, prostituted a high military office, in the time of the country's great trial, to the satisfaction of a private, sordid greed; by one to whose inefficiency and cowardice the bleaching bones of many of the patriotic dead of the war are a fearful and melancholy memento; by one whose well-known groveling instincts and proneness to slime and uncleanness have led the public to insult the brute creation by dubbing him "the beast?"

Yet an honorable Senator had the bad taste, to characterize it by no stronger language, to insult the Senate and the country, to outrage the proprieties of the place, and to cast an uncalled for indignity upon the Republican Senators who voted against the impeachment, by declaring in his place a few days ago that he believed this report to be substantially truthful and correct; in other words, that he believed the accused Senators had perjured themselves and made merchandise of their votes.

Sir, that Senator may live long enough to find a place meet for repentance for having given voice to so flagrant an insult to his fellow Senators. I trust that his Maker may lengthen out his span of life to afford him the opportunity for that repentance, for he will greatly need and greatly desire it. It will not come to him in the State of Michigan, nor in any part of that great, free, and generous West, whose people instinctively abhor all manner of meanness, and who never fail to visit with contempt and condemnation a malicious and cowardly act.

Mr. President, there are many phases of this question of impeachment which are worthy of consideration, and which will be permitted to have their due weight with all impartial minds in that review of the question which must inevitably be had in that great court of last appeal on all questions of public import—the court of public opinion.

Weighty as present considerations may sometimes appear when viewed only by the light of present issues, yet he only is the statesman who looks forward into the future; who judges the issues of to-day by their prospective as well as present effects. He who fails to regard the interests of the coming time as well as of the present, is the politician simply of to-day, of whom history will take little note.

The trial of the impeachment of the President was, in my judgment, one of those epochs which occur in the history of all nations, in which their future destiny is determined by the ability of the individual to resist the popular clamor for the perpetration of an act which aftertime would denounce as a great public wrong. In this instance the success of the impeachment would, in my opinion, have been not only a great public wrong, but also a great public calamity.

It is undeniably true that three fourths of the dominant party of the country were zealously and intensely desirous of the impeachment and removal of the President.

It is undeniably true that during the past three years he has administered the Government in such a manner as to sorely disappoint the highest hopes of the party which elected him.

It is undeniably true that the governmental policy he has sought to establish is regarded by Republicans as of a most mischievous character and ruinous to the best interests of the country.

It is undeniably true that in the matter of reconstruction he has sought to thwart the plainly expressed and undoubted wish of a majority of the people as expressed through their Representatives in Congress.

But it is not true, so far as the testimony adduced on the trial of the impeachment shows, that he has willfully violated the Constitution or the laws.

It is not true, so far as that testimony shows, that he has done these things with the willful and deliberate intent to violate the Constitution or the laws, or to bring disorder upon the country, or disrepute upon the Government.

It is not true, so far as is shown by that evidence, that he has willfully and deliberately transcended the prerogatives vested in him by the Constitution and the laws.

Hence the failure of the cause. Impeachment cannot in any sense be said to be properly a party cause. Articles of impeachment may originate in partisan considerations, may be preferred for the accomplishment of important partisan ends, but when they come to the Senate for trial they are at once divested of all such aspects. The highest judicial officer of the Government presides, and each Senator is sworn by a special oath of an entirely different import from that under which he discharges his legislative duties.

When sworn as members of the court of impeachment we took an oath to impartially try the President. Now, what did "impartially" mean in this connection? Did it mean to decide the case according to the desire and expectation of the Republican party? Did it mean to decide it according to our own individual preconceived opinions? By no means. It meant simply what it said, that we would hear and determine the cause "impartially," without bias from any cause or source whatever, without reference to our own political sentiments and predilections, and without reference to the political sentiments of our constituents, fairly and candidly, on its merits, "according to the Constitution and laws."

If the judgment of the party is to govern, if Senators, in trying a cause of impeachment, are expected to represent and carry out the party will, why go through the mockery of a trial? On the contrary, why not at once depose the President by an act of Congress? At once bid defiance to forms and all inconvenient barriers to the realization of the party will? This would be the bold, manly way, and the only way in which that will can at all times be carried out.

To deliberately trample upon law and established forms was the only way in which impeachment could have been carried as a party measure, and that no party, however strong, can afford to do. When we depart from those forms of law by which we seek the ends of justice we at once inaugurate confusion and anarchy, and we substantially do that when we subordinate the issue of a trial, largely judicial in its nature, to the behests of party will.

A great political party can no more afford to do a wrong or unjust act in the conduct of the affairs of the Government than can an individual in the management of his personal affairs with his neighbors. History is full of instances where parties and communities have suffered reverses by reason of mistakes and acts of oppression and wrong. Measures conceived in an hour of partisan excitement, and consummated under the pressure of party discipline, have been too often condemned and reversed by the more mature judgment of the people for me to allow myself to be at all disconcerted by the frenzied clamor of to-day over the failure of the impeachment. History is not without examples where the courage of the individual has produced results conserving the highest good of great communities. The history of the near future will record this as an instance in which the peace of the country, if not the perpetuity of our institutions, has been preserved and secured by the resolution of a few men who were willing to sacrifice themselves, if need be, to the blind fury of partisan hate. By it the supremacy of those forms of law which underlie all civil government have been vindicated; the scales of justice are held with an even hand, and the country is saved from the confusion and demoralization which always follow a departure from the spirit of acknowledged fundamental law.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1459) to relieve Nelson Tift, of Georgia, of disabilities, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 417) to amend "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by the said State of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico;

A bill (S. No. 16) donating a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation for the exclusive use of a public road;

A bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the Manufacturer's National Bank of New York to change its location;

A bill (S. No. 576) relating to the district courts of Utah Territory;

A bill (S. No. 604) regulating the times and places of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida;

A bill (S. No. 487) to disapprove an act of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory redistricting the Territory and reassigning the judges thereto;

A joint resolution (S. No. 169) appealing to the Turkish Government in behalf of the people of Crete; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) to drop from the rolls of the Army certain officers absent without authority from their command.

NELSON TIFT.

The bill (H. R. No. 1459) to relieve Nelson Tift, of Georgia, of disabilities was read twice by its title.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were therefore signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 553) for the relief of A. W. Ballard;

A bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States; and

A bill (S. No. 1459) to relieve Nelson Tift, of Georgia, of disabilities.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed on the part of the Senate to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make to Congress the two Houses will close the present session, in pursuance of their resolution of 24th instant, at twelve o'clock meridian to-day, by a recess until the third Monday in September next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HENDERSON and Mr. WHYTE the committee on the part of the Senate.

A message subsequently received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that both Houses were ready to adjourn, in accordance with their resolution of the 24th instant, and had appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE, of Wisconsin, the committee on its part.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President and inform him that Congress was ready to adjourn at twelve o'clock to-day in accordance with the terms of their resolution of the 24th instant, unless he had some further communication to make, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them, and the President replied that he had no further communication to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced that the hour of twelve o'clock, fixed by the resolution of the two Houses for closing the present session of Congress by a recess, had arrived, and declared the Senate, in pursuance of the said resolution, adjourned until the third Monday in September next at twelve o'clock.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, September 21, 1868.

The Senate assembled in the Senate Chamber, in the city of Washington, at twelve o'clock noon, in pursuance of the provisions of the following concurrent resolution of the 22d of July last:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, on Monday, the 27th day of July, at twelve o'clock meridian, adjourn their respective Houses until the third Monday of September, and on that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday in December, 1868.

Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou ever blessed God, Maker, Preserver, and Redeemer, we thank Thee that Thou art ever about our path to protect and preserve us. Help us to realize that every good and perfect gift cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning; and help us to respond to Thy goodness and mercy which we receive day by day from Thy hand. We thank Thee that Thou hast protected the life and health of Thy servants, the Senators, during this recess; and now that they are convened again in this high council of the nation, O Lord, we ask that wisdom which is profitable to direct and that grace which is needful to support may be granted unto them; and that whatever course they pursue in this emergency may be such as to meet the Divine approval and sanction of the whole nation. We pray that Thou wilt also sanctify to us the dispensations of Thy providence by death during this recess in the other House. Let not the interests of the nation be periled or jeopardized when great and good men fall. O Lord, we pray that while the workmen die, the work may go forward. Let Thy blessing especially rest upon the President of the United States; endure him with wisdom, and guide him in the faithful discharge of the high trusts committed to his care. Bless also his constitutional advisers, the members of the Cabinet; may they prove to be wise and safe counselors. Bless, we pray Thee, the officers and soldiers of the Army and of the Navy; make them brave and faithful. And bless all the interests of this great people, and let peace and prosperity and quiet and order prevail through all of our borders; and we pray that Thou wilt prepare the minds of the people for the great coming contest at the ballot-box. O Lord, grant that the nation may be wise to choose its ruler, and we ask that Thy blessing may rest upon all the efforts made to advance the interests and promote the prosperity and welfare of the whole nation; and in this contest we ask that the great principles of right and justice and righteousness and loyalty may triumph, and let all the people say amen. All of which we ask through the name of Jesus Christ, our Redeemer and Saviour and Ruler. Amen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Hon. B. F. WADE) took the chair and said: The Senate will please come to order; and the Journal will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate on Monday, July 27, 1868.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and the reading of the Journal will be dispensed with.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I beg to offer a concurrent resolution, which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses until twelve o'clock noon of the 16th day of October, 1868; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, further adjourn their respective Houses until the 10th day of November, at twelve o'clock noon; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered, further adjourn their respective Houses to the first Monday of December, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the vote is taken upon that resolution, I would move a call of the Senate, so that it may appear on the Journal that a legal quorum is present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll of the Senate will be called if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair ascertains that there is a quorum before he calls the Senate to order.

Mr. SHERMAN. It had better be ascertained officially.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll of the Senate will be called.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Warner, Willey, and Wilson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

[Mr. YATES and Mr. McCREERY subsequently appeared.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SPRAGUE] is absent on account of severe illness, from which, I am happy to state, he is now convalescent, although when I last saw him he was not able to leave his chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The question being put, the resolution was declared to be agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I endeavored to address the Chair before the vote was announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not aware of it. The question will be put over again.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I simply desire to call for the yeas and nays on the question of adopting the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not aware that the Senator from Pennsylvania had addressed the Chair before the question was put. The Chair will therefore put the question again. On the adoption of the resolution the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 1; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Warner, Willey, and Wilson—33.

NAY—Mr. Buckalew—1.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, Welch, Whyte, Williams, and Yates—32.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of half an hour the President pro tempore took the chair and called the Senate to order.

Mr. EDWARD MCPHERSON, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives have passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the Senate is requested:

Resolved by the House, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses at twelve o'clock noon of the 16th day of October, 1868; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, further adjourn their respective Houses until the 10th day of November, at twelve o'clock noon; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered, further adjourn their respective Houses to the first Monday of December, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I desire to offer a resolution relating to business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

Mr. SUMNER. I would inquire if the message from the House is not the subject before the Senate. I move a concurrence in the resolution of the House, if that is in order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suggest, sir, that my resolution having been received by the Chair, must be first considered. It may be read, at least.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to its being read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of Mr. BUCKALEW, as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to inform the Senate whether a quorum of the members of that House are present at the sitting of this day.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I desire to state that I have been in the House—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I object to the present consideration of that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That carries it over under the rule.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate concur with the resolution from the House.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator will wait a moment, I desire to make a remark in explanation of my resolution. I was about to say that I had been in the House of Representatives and was informed by members that there was not a quorum—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I submit that an objection having been made to the resolution, it goes over, and debate is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does go over under the rule; but the Senator wished to make an explanation. If the rule is insisted upon, of course the resolution is disposed of.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I merely wish to remark, then, that before acting upon the resolution from the House, it will be proper, if not necessary, to inquire of the House whether it be in fact constituted with a quorum. I believe the ordinary usage of the two Houses at the opening of a session is to inform each other that a quorum is present. Now, the Senate has not passed any such resolution, and we have received none such from the House. I suggest, therefore, that under the usage of the two Houses of Congress it is necessary for the Senate to give notice to the House and the House to give notice to the Senate that a quorum is present. Otherwise, we cannot officially be informed or know that there is another branch with whom we can communicate. Before, therefore, acting upon the resolution which we have received from the House, I suggest that it is necessary to give formal notice between the two bodies; and I make this suggestion in connection with the information which I now give to the Senate, that I have been informed in the House itself, by members of the House, that a quorum is not present, and will not be until afternoon, if at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark that he has not considered this as a new session, but barely as an adjournment from day to day. It covers a larger period, to be sure, but we have treated it as we have all other temporary adjournments, as a continuation of the original session, and did not suppose those formalities were ordinarily gone through with.

Mr. SUMNER. I call for a vote on my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair is entirely correct in its suggestion to the Senator from Pennsylvania. This adjournment is precisely like one over the holidays or over any three days. Both Houses are supposed to have a quorum, and we know by the Constitution that the House of Representatives, having sent us a message, has a quorum. What private information a Senator is to obtain on the floor of the House of Representatives no man can tell; and it is a somewhat unusual proceeding, the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me to remind him, and a somewhat unparliamentary proceeding, for a Senator to undertake to inform this body whether another coordinate body is properly constituted or not from his personal knowledge and investigation into the affairs of that body. The two Houses cannot have intercommunication in that way. Therefore what the Chair has said is entirely correct, and the pending question must be on the resolution from the House of Representatives.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I was not present at the roll-call. I desire to have my name entered as present.

Several SENATORS. Can that be done?

Mr. POMEROY. It does not interfere with our rule. It is simply allowing a Senator's name to be entered as present on the roll-call, not on any vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule does not tolerate a vote being recorded unless the person is present; but I understand the Senator from Illinois wishes his name to be recorded as being present.

Mr. YATES. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection to that, I believe. ["No objection."] The name will be recorded.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is on the motion to concur.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I suppose it had better be read. I ask for its reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses until twelve o'clock noon of the 16th day of October, 1868; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, further adjourn their respective Houses until the 10th day of November, at twelve o'clock noon; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered, further adjourn their respective Houses to the first Monday of December, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I suppose I shall be strictly in order in submitting some remarks on the question of concurrence in this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am in favor of having everything done decently and in order. I am opposed to any "sharp practice" in the public affairs and conduct of the Government. In accordance with this idea I had no difficulty in responding this morning upon the organization of the Senate, being present and thinking it undignified, if not improper, to withhold my vote. The Senate had a call, upon which names were recorded on the Journal. The record is made up for history to show that we proceed in a regular manner. We are now organized and authorized, under the rule which we have heretofore adopted in reference to a quorum of this body, to proceed with the transaction of business.

Now, sir, I proposed that we should ask of the House of Representatives whether they had met and organized in a similar manner—a respectful request in the form of a resolution. It seemed to me a little surprising that any member of the Senate should object to the resolution when, accompanying the offer of it, I stated as a matter of personal knowledge, obtained by inquiry of members of the House itself, that a quorum of that body was not convened to-day, and that it was not possible to have such a quorum until this afternoon or evening, when possibly members enough for a quorum may be present in Washington. The House sends us, by its Clerk, a resolution adopted without the yeas and nays, without any previous call of that body, without any official information to us that a quorum competent to transact business is assembled in the Hall of the House. In truth the fact is exactly the opposite; there is no such quorum convened. That is a matter of fact of which I have no doubt, and of which other members of the Senate need have no doubt.

Now, sir, it is said that we are to take a communication from the House as conclusive that that body is convened; that a competent quorum under the Constitution is there assembled and ready to transact business. That presumption might answer if the Senate had no other information; but here it is proposed to stand upon a technical presumption when we are well convinced that the fact is exactly opposite. If there be any question or doubt on this subject the proper mode of proceeding, I submit, is to take up and consider the resolution which I have presented; to call upon the House itself to inform us as to the fact.

I have but one additional remark to make, and that is that I think it manifestly an improper, if not an indecent thing that the Government of the United States should be conducted upon this principle of false presumptions that we know are not well founded in truth; that we should attempt to transact business in the two Houses without a quorum of each being present.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seems to me that the Senator from Pennsylvania proceeds upon the theory which the Chair corrected when the motion was first submitted. This is not a new session of Congress; this is merely an adjournment of the second session of the Fortieth Congress. Half our business, in point of fact, as every Senator knows, is transacted without a quorum. What should we think if, any day in the middle of a session, the House of Representatives should send us a message inquiring if a quorum was present when we had passed a certain bill and sent it to them? I would not attribute any such intention to the Senator from Pennsylvania, but certainly I think such a message would be impertinent. We might as well ask if the Speaker had been elected according to the rules of the House, if there were not some members in the House who had been admitted to their seats without proper qualifications. It is an assumption on our part to inquire into the organization of the House, and I am quite sure that such a message would be resented in the House as the Senator from Pennsylvania would resent such a message if sent from the House here. I think if the House of Representatives should send a message inquiring if we were properly organized, if we were authorized to do what we had just done, we should take it as an exceedingly impertinent interference in affairs with which the House has no business any more than we have with the affairs of the House. They have sent us a communication; and if they passed the resolution which they have communicated when there was not a quorum present, the fault, if there be any, is theirs, not ours. If they have done that, they have done what has been done a thousand times in both Houses. Very important bills have been passed in both Houses when we knew there was no quorum. I have known some treaties to be negotiated here when there were but three Senators present, and yet nobody doubts the validity of those treaties.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator does not mean to say they were "negotiated," I hope.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; "ratified." I do not know, but I might say, they were negotiated here. I believe the Senator from Kansas had charge of them; they were Indian treaties; they might have been amended here, and thus I might almost say were negotiated here. I do not think there is any pertinence at all in the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I think it can have no useful effect.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will make one further suggestion, and then leave this subject. The House meets, a resolution is proposed and passed, and sent here. Shortly afterward the yeas and nays are called, and the House ascertains that it has acted without a quorum. It is ascertained by a roll-call. Now, are we to catch up their resolution because it has been already sent here and act upon it?

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senator this question: When any action is adopted by the House and is sent to the Senate, if upon some subsequent proposition it is ascertained that there is no quorum present are we to infer that there was no quorum present at the preceding business? Is the Senate to inquire of the House whether it was so or not?

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator does not understand me. He was speaking about disrespect to the House in suggesting a state of facts where the House act on a proposition, send it here, and ascertain the fact of not having a quorum immediately afterward.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then, if they find that they passed a resolution when they had no proper authority to pass it, it is their business to send to us and ask to have the resolution sent back, and I should vote to send it back under those circumstances.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir; but suppose in the mean time we concur in it and adjourn?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate, but I think it right to say a word in reply to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. I quite agree with my friend from Rhode Island that it would be impertinent, not to say insulting, for us to undertake to inquire into the organization of the House of Representatives when that House had sent to us any bill or proposition. Now, my friend from Pennsylvania asserts, on his personal information and belief, that there was no quorum of the House when the pending resolution was passed by that body. What ground has he for supposing so? He states that somebody told him that on a call afterward a quorum was not there. Now, the fair presumption is—and I believe it myself—that there was a quorum when the resolution passed; and after it passed, the business of the session being accomplished, members went away, particularly the Democratic members, who were in haste to get back to their constituents. My friend entirely jumps at a conclusion when he undertakes to say that the resolution was passed by less than a quorum of the House, because half an hour afterward, all the business of the session being accomplished and members having gone away, the House found itself then without a quorum. We might just as well this evening refuse to consider anything binding that was done in the morning when we had a quorum, because it turns out that we have not one in the afternoon. It is altogether improper, as I think, to raise a question of that kind as to the organization of the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate stands adjourned until the 16th day of October next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; the Chair should first inform the House that we have agreed to the resolution, and then we shall stand adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We have agreed to their resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Secretary can inform the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution having been concurred in, ipso facto, the Senate stands adjourned until the 16th of October, at twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 21, 1868.

The House reassembled, pursuant to adjournment, at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The SPEAKER. The recess having expired, the House of Representatives resumes its session. The Journal of the last day's session in July is in print, and if there be no objection its reading will be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ANOTHER RECESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses until twelve o'clock noon on the 16th day of October, 1868; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, further adjourn their respective Houses until the 10th day of November, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon; and then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is right.

Mr. SCHENCK. I modify the resolution so as to read, "when the two Houses adjourn to-day;" and demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Ought it not to read, "sine die?"

Mr. SCHENCK. It amounts to the same thing. I have followed the form of the last resolution.

Mr. MILLER. Say the 21st instead of the 16th? [Cries of "Question!"]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the second session of the Fortieth Congress it shall be in order to suspend the rules at any time.

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules to present the resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for tellers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will for the present withdraw the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it not too late?

The SPEAKER. It is not too late, as there has been no final vote. It can be withdrawn or modified.

Mr. SCHENCK. Our meeting will be on Friday, and it may be important to have this resolution adopted.

SUPERVISORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be directed to inquire into the reasons why the supervisors of internal revenue provided for in the law of July 28, 1868, have not been appointed; and also to ascertain whether or not, since the passage of the said law, there has been any failure on the part of any officer of the Government properly to administer the internal revenue laws, or any attempt on the part of said officer, or of any person, to defeat, embarrass, prevent, or improperly interfere with the prompt and efficient administration of said laws; with power by sub-committee or otherwise to sit during any recess of Congress and send for persons and papers and to administer oaths; the necessary expenses to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the introduction of any general business. I object to this resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules; and if the House will allow me, I will state, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, there is ground for this resolution—

Mr. BROOKS. I do not object if we on this side of the House can be heard.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I have no statement to make.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 91, noes 6; no quorum voting.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the resolution. Has any notice come from the Senate?

The SPEAKER. None.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that we take a recess for half an hour; and I ask unanimous consent if a message come from the Senate before that time expires the Speaker shall then call the House to order.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. We cannot take a recess without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that no quorum voted on the last vote, and that no recess can be taken except by unanimous consent when no quorum is present. The Chair thinks that a quorum perhaps may be present, as he has noticed that some gentlemen have not voted on any of the divisions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I demand tellers on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to renew it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then, as we are to be kept here, I renew the resolution in reference to the execution of the internal revenue laws; and upon it I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is not necessary. The motion is to suspend the rules to allow the resolution to be introduced, which is not debatable.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Which resolution is it?

The SPEAKER. The resolution for an investigation in regard to the internal revenue.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order; and for the purpose of sustaining my point of order I ask to have read the order under which the House assembled to-day.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, on Monday, the 27th day of July, at twelve o'clock m., do adjourn their respective Houses until the third Monday of September; and on that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1868."

Mr. BROOKS. The point of order that I make is that a second resolution is not in order until the conditions of the first order of this House are complied with; that they have not yet been complied with; that so far as any demonstration has been made, the demonstration has been such that there is no quorum present; that it is not within our power to do business of any kind until there is a quorum present; and that the proper way to ascertain whether there is a quorum present is to call the roll and ascertain it in that legitimate manner. We have attempted to ascertain illegitimately, by outside demonstrations, and they have all demonstrated that no quorum is now present. The point, therefore, which I make is that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio is not in order until it is first ascertained by a regular call of the House that a quorum of members is present; and further, that it is the duty of the Speaker when it is demonstrated, as it has been, that there is no quorum present, to adjourn the House till December.

The SPEAKER. The point of order embraces, as the Chair understands it, two propositions: first, that there can be no other business on this day except to act on resolutions to adjourn; and secondly, that the absence of a quorum, upon a count by the Speaker, prevents other business being transacted. The last point, of course, the gentleman from New York does not intend to press, because the demand for the yeas and nays on the proposition is to ascertain the fact whether there is a quorum in attendance. The Chair, as he has already stated, saw gentlemen, including the gentleman from New York himself, who, contrary to the rules of the House, did not vote on the division when the Chair counted. The Chair, therefore, overrules that part of the point of order. The first part is important, and the Chair thinks substantial, but he overrules it on this ground; the resolution reads as follows:

"And on that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1868."

It will be noticed that this resolution differs entirely from the resolution under which the supplemental session of 1867 was held, which provided specially that when the two Houses met the roll should immediately be called, and if a quorum did not appear of each House the Presiding Officer should declare both Houses adjourned until the regular session. This language is totally different, and seems to raise an entirely different inference as to the business of this day. It says:

"On that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1868."

This gives to both branches of Congress the entire legislative day of the 21st of September within which to settle the question of the adjournment of the two Houses. Any hour at which they may settle it on this legislative day will comply with the terms of the concurrent resolution. For instance, both Houses could transact legislative business during the entire legislative day until they were ready to adjourn, and could then agree to a further adjournment till the first Monday of December, or till some other time, if a quorum should be in attendance. The resolution gives to the two Houses the whole day in which to decide this question. Under the resolution the two Houses may be in session the whole day; it does not say that the question as to the time to which an adjournment shall be had must be determined the first hour or the second hour or the last hour of the day. Therefore the Chair thinks it is competent for a majority of the House to adopt a resolution upon any other subject which they may deem proper.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether it is within the power of the House to take any legislative action whatever when there is not a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. RANDALL. There is not now a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. That has only appeared by the count of the Chair. Whether a quorum is present will be disclosed by the call of the yeas and nays about to be taken. If upon that call no quorum should appear of course no business can be transacted.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair himself announced that there was not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. By his count.

Mr. RANDALL. Therefore the introduction of any resolution or the transaction of any legislative business is not in order till it be made manifest to the Speaker that a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. There has been no legislative business transacted.

Mr. RANDALL. A resolution involving action by the House other than adjournment is legislative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] who came into the House a little after the hour of meeting, the character of the business transacted this morning. By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of the day when the House was last in session was dispensed with. In that action the presence of a quorum was presumed, as no member called for a division. By unanimous consent, also, a concurrent resolution in regard to adjournment was adopted, no division being called for, and the Journal presuming, as the Speaker does, the presence of a quorum. The next resolution offered was one authorizing the suspension of the rules on any day during the remainder of the second session of the Fortieth Congress. Upon that no vote was taken by yeas and nays or by tellers. Upon a count by the Chair no quorum appeared, but that does not prove that no quorum is in attendance. Some members, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, have come in since. The yeas and nays have now been demanded, and the vote about to be taken will show whether a quorum is present.

Mr. RANDALL. My point is that whenever the House finds itself without a quorum it is not competent to transact legislative business.

The SPEAKER. There is no record upon the Journal of the absence of a quorum. The resolution upon which a count was made by the Speaker was withdrawn by the mover, as he had the right to withdraw it, before a final decision, under the rule, to be found on page 120 of the Digest.

Mr. RANDALL. I am supported in my point by the declaration of the Speaker himself, that no quorum was present.

The SPEAKER. Upon a count no quorum appeared. It very frequently happens, indeed almost every day during a regular session, that upon a count by the Chair a quorum does not appear, though a quorum is subsequently elicited on a vote by tellers or yeas and nays. The question is now upon the suspension of the rules to permit the introduction of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the roll will now be called.

The question was put; and there were—yeas 100, nays 2, not voting 119; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Carke, Callis, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Corley, Cornell, Dawes, Deweese, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Ella, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Gove, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, Lash, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Poland, Prince, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittmore, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Young—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Kellogg and Spalding—2.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Blackburn, Boles, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Cary, Chanler, Burr, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Hinds, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Mallory, Marshall, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Niblack, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polesley, Pomeroy, Price, Pruy, Randall, Baum, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Solye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Stone, Sypher, Tabor, Taffe, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—119.

The SPEAKER. There is not a quorum voting.

During the call of the roll a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had adopted the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses until twelve o'clock noon of the 16th day of October, 1868; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, further adjourn their respective Houses until the 10th day of November, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered, further adjourn their respective Houses to the first Monday of December, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to call attention to the fact that Mr. BROOKS, Mr. ELDRIDGE, and Mr. RANDALL, who are present, do not vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not suppose there will be any objection to pass the resolution which came from the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to take it up and pass it.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum on the last vote.

Mr. MULLINS. If I am not at fault in regard to the rules of the House, when there appears not to be a quorum a definite number may order those who do not appear to be brought within the pale of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. MULLINS. I ask, to carry out that idea, a call of the House be had, and we proceed to take things in order according to the rules.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk accordingly proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Blackburn, Boles, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckley, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Cary, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Hinds, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Mallory, Marshall, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Niblack, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polesley, Pomeroy, Price, Pruy, Randall, Baum, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Solye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Stone, Sypher, Tabor, Taffe, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van

Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, Woodward, and Young.

The doors were then closed, and the Clerk proceeded to call the names of the absentees for excuses:

GEORGE M. ADAMS. No excuse offered.
WILLIAM B. ALLISON. No excuse offered.

Mr. BROOMALL. Would it be in order to move that my colleague, Mr. RANDALL, be excused?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. RANDALL can speak for himself.

Mr. BROOMALL. He is not here. He is very much indisposed. He is not here at least in contemplation of law.

Mr. RANDALL. He is not only here now, but he will be here in the next Congress, which the gentleman will not. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a motion to excuse any member who is on the list of absentees is always in order during a call of the House.

Mr. BROOMALL. I think, then, I ought to move that my colleague be excused on account of indisposition to vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is himself excused from the next Congress by the indisposition of his constituents to send him here. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How is it with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL?]

Mr. RANDALL. I am coming back.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If you get votes enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL. My colleague's case has not yet been passed upon.

Mr. RANDALL. Yours has.

Mr. BROOMALL. I think, Mr. Speaker, I will make the motion I have indicated, that my colleague be excused on account of indisposition to vote.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether a message has been received from the Senate?

The SPEAKER. A message cannot be received while the doors are closed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is a message at the door?

Mr. PAINE. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to; and the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT.

A message from the Senate was announced, when Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, said: I am directed by the Senate to inform the House that the Senate has concurred in the resolution of the House for the adjournment of the two Houses till the 16th day of October next, and for the subsequent adjournments named in the resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK, (at one o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; when

The SPEAKER said: In accordance with the concurrent resolution adopted by the two Houses of Congress, I declare the second session of the Fortieth Congress adjourned till Friday, the 16th day of October, at noon.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, October 16, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of Monday, September 21, 1868, was read and approved.

Senators present—Hons. B. F. Wade, S. Cameron, C. Cole, and D. T. Patterson of Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (Hon. B. F. WADE.) Unless a motion be interposed the Chair will declare the Senate adjourned. [After a pause.] No motion being made, the Chair declares the Senate adjourned to the 10th day of November, 1868, pursuant to the resolution of the two Houses adopted on Monday, the 21st September last.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 16, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, as follows:

Almighty God, our Creator, Preserver, and Redeemer: Thanks be to Thy holy name for all Thy gracious gifts unto the children of men, not only for the creation of our lives, but their preservation, and above all, for the highest of all Thy blessings, the knowledge of salvation through Jesus Christ, Thy Son. We bless Thee that Thou hast added to all other gifts of Thine the preservation of our lives while we have been separated from each other, and that we are permitted to meet again in peace this morning. Glory to God on high for all his mercies shown! We bless Thee, O God, for all the evidences Thou art giving us of right-mindedness in the population of this land; and we beseech Thee that Thou wilt so teach the people that in the result, when the great issue of the contest is reached, we shall find that expression so given as to place the country immovably from this time forward upon the great foundations on which alone it can rest—righteousness and justice, out of which peace and prosperity will come. We bless Thee, O God, that from this day forth we may believe that peace and order shall begin to be restored to the country, that bloodshed and outrage and disorder of every kind shall begin to cease; for we think we see the beginning of the end of strife—the beginning, and we hope the rapid growth and final maturity of a great, free, American, Christian nationality. We pray Thee, O God, to bless the whole nation, to remember all classes and conditions of the people. Give all their due rights. Minister unto all such consolations as they need. Prepare us all for our great mission in this world as a Christian nation, and individually for the great work we have to perform and for the solemn account we have to render. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The recess having expired, the House of Representatives resumes its session. The Journal of the 21st of September is not in possession of the Clerk, but is at the Printing Office. If there be no objection the reading of it will be dispensed with. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will now read the concurrent resolution under which the two Houses of Congress convene on this day.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the two Houses adjourn to-day the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses until twelve o'clock noon on the 16th day of October, 1868; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, further adjourn their respective Houses until the 10th day of November, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon; and then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon."

The SPEAKER. If no motion is made looking to the rescinding in whole or in part of this concurrent resolution, it is the duty of the Chair under the resolution to declare the House of Representatives adjourned until Tuesday, the 10th of November, at noon. [A pause.] In accordance with the concurrent resolution adopted by the two Houses on the 21st of September last, I declare the second session of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress adjourned until Tuesday, the 10th of November, at noon.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, November 10, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of Friday, the 16th of October last, was read and approved.

Senators present—Hons. B. F. Wade of Ohio, H. W. Corbett of Oregon, James Harlan of Iowa, Edwin D. Morgan of New York, and William Pinckney Whyte of Maryland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (Hon. B. F. WADE,) pursuant to the adjournment on the 16th of October last, took the chair at twelve o'clock m.; and he directed the resolution adopted on the 21st of September, under which the adjournment on the 16th of October last to this day was ordered, to be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses until twelve o'clock noon of the 16th day of October, 1868; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, further adjourn their respective Houses until the 10th day of November, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered, further adjourn their respective Houses to the first Monday of December, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless it be otherwise ordered, the Chair, according to the order which has been read, will declare the Senate adjourned until the first Monday of December next. [After a pause.] No motion being made it is so declared, and the Senate stands adjourned until the first Monday of December next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, November 10, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, as follows:

Almighty God, Creator and Preserver of us all. We thank Thee for that kind and fatherly protection by which we have been spared unto this present hour, and desire to lift our prayers and thanksgivings once more unto Thee through Jesus Christ our Advocate and Redeemer. We beseech Thee, O Lord, to accept our thanks for the good issue to which Thou hast brought the great questions that have been pending before the country. We believe that

Thou hast inspired the people of this land to come to right decisions; and we hail the beginnings of peace and prosperity, which we believe, through Thy blessing, will be stable and enduring. And now we commend unto Thee those whom, through the people of this country, Thou hast chosen to soon rule over us. May their lives and their health be precious in Thy sight! O God, preserve them, we pray Thee, from any attempted violence or injury, and suffer not the country to be brought again to the hour of mourning, as it once was, by violent hands. Preserve them, and bless them in all their private as well as their public relations. Remember all our rulers and legislators, all who are controlling the destinies of this great land. Be Thou the teacher of them all, the inspirer of their minds and the sanctifier of their hearts, that this country may be brought speedily under the complete control of those principles for which Jesus died, and for the establishment of which He rose again and now reigns on high. The Lord accept this our morning offering, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The recess having expired, the House of Representatives resumes its session. If there be no objection the reading of the Journal of the last day's session will be dispensed with. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will now read the concurrent resolution under which this adjourned session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn to-day the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses until twelve o'clock noon on the 16th day of October, 1868; and that they then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, further adjourn their respective Houses until the 10th day of November, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon; and then, unless otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1868, at twelve o'clock noon."

The SPEAKER. As the time designated in the concluding part of this resolution is the day on which the third session of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress will by law commence, an adjournment to-day, unless otherwise ordered, will be an adjournment without day of the second session of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the concurrent resolution adopted by the two Houses of Congress, I declare the second session of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress adjourned without day.

Message of the President.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

MESSAGE

OF THE

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives :

The continued disorganization of the Union, to which the President has so often called the attention of Congress, is yet a subject of profound and patriotic concern. We may, however, find some relief from that anxiety in the reflection that the painful political situation, although before untried by ourselves, is not new in the experience of nations. Political science, perhaps as highly perfected in our own time and country as in any other, has not yet disclosed any means by which civil wars can be absolutely prevented. An enlightened nation, however, with a wise and beneficent Constitution of free government, may diminish their frequency and mitigate their severity by directing all its proceedings in accordance with its fundamental law.

When a civil war has been brought to a close, it is manifestly the first interest and duty of the State to repair the injuries which the war has inflicted, and to secure the benefit of the lessons it teaches as fully and as speedily as possible. This duty was, upon the termination of the rebellion, promptly accepted, not only by the executive department, but by the insurrectionary States themselves, and restoration, in the first moment of peace, was believed to be as easy and certain as it was indispensable. The expectations, however, then so reasonably and confidently entertained were disappointed by legislation from which I felt constrained, by my obligations to the Constitution, to withhold my assent.

It is therefore a source of profound regret that in complying with the obligation imposed upon the President by the Constitution, to give to Congress, from time to time, information of the state of the Union, I am unable to communicate any definitive adjustment, satisfactory to the American people, of the questions which, since the close of the rebellion, have agitated the public mind. On the contrary, candor compels me to declare that at this time there is no Union, as our Fathers understood the term, and as they meant it to be understood by us. The Union which they established can exist only where all the States are represented in both Houses of Congress; where one State is as free as another to regulate its internal concerns according to its own will; and where the laws of the central Government, strictly confined to matters of national jurisdiction, apply with equal force to all the people of every section. That such is not the present "state of the Union" is a melancholy fact; and we all must acknowledge that the restoration of the States to their proper legal relations with the Federal Government, and with one another, according to the terms of the original compact, would be the greatest temporal blessing which God, in His kindest providence, could bestow upon this nation. It becomes our imperative duty to consider whether or not it is impossible to effect this most desirable consummation.

The Union and the Constitution are inseparable. As long as one is obeyed by all parties the other will be preserved, and if one is destroyed, both must perish together. The destruction of the Constitution will be followed by other and still greater calamities. It was ordained not only to form a more perfect union between the States, but to "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Nothing but implicit obedience to its requirements in all parts of the country will accomplish these great ends. Without that obedience we can look forward only to continual outrages upon individual rights, incessant breaches of the public peace, national weakness, financial dishonor, the total loss of our prosperity, the general corruption of morals, and the final extinction of popular freedom. To save our country from evils so appalling as these we should renew our efforts again and again.

To me the process of restoration seems perfectly plain and simple. It consists merely in a faithful application of the Constitution and laws. The execution of the laws is not now obstructed or opposed by physical force. There is no military or other necessity, real or pretended, which can prevent obedience to the Constitution, either North or South. All the rights and all the obligations of States and individuals can be protected and enforced by means perfectly consistent with the fundamental law. The courts may be everywhere open, and, if open, their process would be unimpeded. Crimes against the United States can be prevented or punished by the proper judicial authorities, in a manner entirely practicable and legal. There is therefore no reason why the Constitution should not be obeyed, unless those who exercise its powers have determined that it shall be disregarded and violated. The mere naked will of this Government, or of some one or more of its branches, is the only obstacle that can exist to a perfect union of all the States.

On this momentous question, and some of the measures growing out of it, I have had the misfortune to differ from Congress, and have expressed my convictions without reserve, though with becoming deference to the opinion of the legislative department. Those convictions are not only unchanged, but strengthened by subsequent events and further reflection. The transcendent importance of the subject will be a sufficient excuse for calling your attention to some of the reasons which have so strongly influenced my own judgment. The hope that we may all finally concur in a mode of settlement, consistent at once with our true interests and with our sworn duties to the Constitution, is too natural and too just to be easily relinquished.

It is clear to my apprehension that the States lately in rebellion are still members of the national Union. When did they cease to be so? The "ordinances of secession," adopted by a portion (in most of them a very small portion) of their citizens, were mere nullities. If we admit now that they were valid and effectual for the purpose intended by their authors, we sweep from under our feet the whole ground upon which we justified the war. Were those States afterward expelled from the Union by the war? The direct contrary was averred by this Government to be its purpose, and was so understood by all those who gave their blood and treasure to aid in its prosecution. It cannot be that a successful war, waged for the preservation of the Union, had the legal effect of dissolving it. The victory of the nation's arms was not the disgrace of her policy; the defeat of secession on the battle-field was not the triumph of its lawless principle. Nor could Congress, with or without the consent of the Executive, do anything which would have the effect, directly or indirectly, of separating the States from each other. To dissolve the Union is to repeal the Constitution which holds it together, and that is a power which does not belong to any department of this Government, nor to all of them united.

This is so plain that it has been acknowledged by all branches of the Federal Government. The Executive (my predecessor as well as myself) and the heads of all the Departments have uniformly acted upon the principle that the Union is not only undissolved, but indissoluble. Congress submitted an amendment of the Constitution to be ratified by the southern States, and accepted their acts of ratification as a necessary and lawful exercise of their highest function. If they were not States, or were States out of the Union, their consent to a change in the fundamental law of the Union would have been nugatory, and Congress, in asking it, committed a political absurdity. The judiciary has also given the solemn sanction of its authority to the same view of the case. The judges of the Supreme Court have included the southern States in their circuits, and they are constantly, in banc and elsewhere, exercising jurisdiction which does not belong to them, unless those States are States of the Union.

If the southern States are component parts of the Union, the Constitution is the supreme law for them, as it is for all the other States. They are bound to obey it, and so are we. The right of the Federal Government, which is clear and unquestionable, to enforce the Constitution upon them, implies the correlative obligation on our part to observe its limitations and execute its guarantees. Without the Constitution we are nothing; by, through, and under the Constitution we are what it makes us. We may doubt the wisdom of the law, we may not approve of its provisions, but we cannot violate it merely because it seems to confine our powers within limits narrower than we could wish. It is not a question of individual, or class, or sectional interest, much less of party predominance, but of duty—of high and sacred duty—which we are all sworn to perform. If we cannot support the Constitution with the cheerful alacrity of those who love and believe in it we must give to it at least the fidelity of public servants who act under solemn obligations and commands which they dare not disregard.

The constitutional duty is not the only one which requires the States to be restored. There is another consideration, which, though of minor importance, is yet of great weight. On the 22d day of July, 1861, Congress declared by an almost unanimous vote of both Houses that the war should be conducted solely for the purpose of preserving the Union and maintaining the supremacy of the Federal Constitution and laws, without impairing the dignity, equality, and rights of the States or of individuals, and that when this was done the war should cease. I do not say that this declaration is personally binding on those who joined in making it any more than individual members of Congress are personally bound to pay a public debt created under a law for which they voted. But it was a solemn, public, official pledge of the national honor, and I cannot imagine upon what grounds the repudiation of it is to be justified. If it be said that we are not bound to keep faith with rebels let it be remembered that this promise was not made to rebels only. Thousands of true men in the South were drawn to our standard by it, and hundreds of thousands in the North gave their lives in the belief that it would be carried out. It was made on the day after the first great battle of the war had been fought and lost. All patriotic and intelligent men then saw the necessity of giving such an assurance, and believed that without it the war would end in disaster to our cause. Having given that assurance in the extremity of our peril, the violation of it now in the day of our power would be a rude rending of that good faith which holds the moral world together; our country would cease to have any claim upon the confidence of men; it would make the war not only a failure, but a fraud.

Being sincerely convinced that these views are correct, I would be unfaithful to my duty if I did not recommend the repeal of the acts of Congress which place ten of the southern States under the domination of military masters. If calm reflection shall satisfy a majority of your honorable bodies that the acts referred to are not only a violation of the national faith, but in direct conflict with the Constitution, I dare not permit myself to doubt that you will immediately strike them from the statute-book.

To demonstrate the unconstitutional character of those acts I need no more than refer to their general provisions. It must be seen at once that they are not authorized. To dictate what alterations shall be made in the constitutions of the several States; to control the elections of State legislators and State officers, members of Congress and electors of President and Vice President, by arbitrarily declaring who shall vote and who shall be excluded from that privilege; to dissolve State Legislatures or prevent them from assembling; to dismiss judges and other civil functionaries of the State, and appoint others without regard to State law; to organize and operate all the political machinery of the States; to regulate the whole administration of their domestic and local affairs according to the mere will of strange and irresponsible agents, sent among them for that purpose; these are powers not granted to the Federal Government or to any one of its branches. Not being granted, we violate our trust by assuming them as palpably as we would by acting in the face of a positive interdict; for the Constitution forbids us to do whatever it does not affirmatively authorize, either by express words or by clear implication. If the authority we desire to use does not come to us through the Constitution, we can exercise it only by usurpation; and usurpation is the most dangerous of political crimes. By that crime the enemies of free government in all ages have worked out their designs against public liberty and private right. It leads directly and immediately to the establishment of absolute rule; for undelegated power is always unlimited and unrestrained.

The acts of Congress in question are not only objectionable for their assumption of ungranted power, but many of their provisions are in conflict with the direct prohibitions of the Constitution. The Constitution commands that a republican form of government shall be guaranteed to all the States; that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, arrested without a judicial warrant, or punished without a fair trial before an impartial jury; that the privilege of habeas corpus shall not be denied in time of peace; and that no bill of attainder shall be passed even against a single individual. Yet the system of measures established by these acts of Congress does totally subvert and destroy the form as well as the substance of republican government in the ten States to which they apply. It binds them hand and foot in absolute slavery, and subjects them to a strange and hostile power, more unlimited and more likely to be abused than any other now known among civilized men. It tramples down all those rights in which the essence of liberty consists, and which a free government is always most careful to protect. It denies the habeas corpus and the trial by jury. Personal freedom, property, and life, if assailed by the passion, the prejudice, or the rapacity of the ruler, have no security whatever. It has the effect of a bill of attainder, or bill of pains and penalties, not upon a few individuals, but upon whole masses, including the millions who inhabit the subject States, and even their unborn children. These wrongs, being expressly forbidden, cannot be constitutionally inflicted upon any portion of our people, no matter how they may have come within our jurisdiction, and no matter whether they live in States, Territories, or districts.

I have no desire to save from the proper and just consequences of their great crime those who engaged in rebellion against the Government; but as a mode of punishment the measures under consideration are the most unreasonable that could be invented. Many of those people are perfectly innocent; many kept their fidelity to the Union untainted to the last; many were incapable of any legal offense; a large proportion even of the persons able to bear arms were forced into rebellion against their will; and of those who are guilty with their own consent, the degrees of guilt are as various as the shades of their character and temper. But these acts of Congress confound them all together in one common doom. Indiscriminate vengeance upon classes, sects, and parties, or upon whole communities, for offenses committed by a portion of them against the governments to which they owed obedience, was common in the barbarous ages of the world. But Christianity and civilization have made such progress that recourse to a punishment so cruel and unjust would meet with the condemnation of all unprejudiced and right-minded men. The punitive justice of this age, and especially of this country, does not consist in stripping whole States of their liberties, and reducing all their people, without distinction, to the condition of slavery. It deals separately with each individual, confines itself to the forms of law, and vindicates its own purity by an impartial examination of every case before a competent judicial tribunal. If this does not satisfy all our desires with regard to southern rebels, let us console ourselves by reflecting that a free Constitution, triumphant in war and unbroken in peace, is worth far more to us and our children than the gratification of any present feeling.

I am aware that it is assumed that this system of government for the southern States is not to be perpetual. It is true this military government is to be only provisional, but it is through this temporary evil that a greater evil is to be made perpetual. If the guarantees of the Constitution can be broken provisionally to serve a temporary purpose, and in a part only of the country, we can destroy them everywhere and for all time. Arbitrary measures often change, but they generally change for the worse. It is the curse of despotism that it has no halting place. The intermitted exercise of its power brings no sense of security to its subjects; for they can never know what more they will be called to endure when its red right hand is armed to plague them again. Nor is it possible to conjecture how or where power, unrestrained by law, may seek its next victims. The States that are still free may be enslaved at any moment; for if the Constitution does not protect all it protects none.

It is manifestly and avowedly the object of these laws to confer upon negroes the privilege of voting, and to disfranchise such a number of white citizens as will give the former a clear majority at all elections in the southern States. This, to the minds of some persons, is so important that a violation of the Constitution is justified as a means of bringing it about. The morality is always false which excuses a wrong because it proposes to accomplish a desirable end. We are not permitted to do evil that good may come. But in this case the end itself is evil, as well as the means. The subjugation of the States to negro domination would be worse than the military despotism under which they are now suffering. It was believed beforehand that the people would endure any amount of military oppression, for any length of time, rather than degrade themselves by subjection to the negro race. Therefore they have been left without a choice. Negro suffrage was established by act of Congress, and the military officers were commanded to superintend the process of clothing the negro race with the political privileges torn from white men.

The blacks in the South are entitled to be well and humanely governed, and to have the protection of just laws for all their rights of person and property. If it were practicable at this time to give them a government exclusively their own, under which they might manage their own affairs in their own way, it would become a grave question whether we ought to do so, or whether common humanity would not require us to save them from themselves. But, under the circumstances, this is only a speculative point. It is not proposed merely that they shall govern themselves, but that they shall rule the white race, make and administer State laws, elect Presidents and members of Congress, and shape, to a greater or less extent, the future destiny of the whole country. Would such a trust and power be safe in such hands?

The peculiar qualities which should characterize any people who are fit to decide upon the management of public affairs for a great State have seldom been combined. It is the glory of white men to know that they have had these qualities in sufficient measure to build upon this continent a great political fabric, and to preserve its stability for more than ninety years, while in every other part of the world all similar experiments have failed. But if anything can be proved by known facts—if all reasoning upon evidence is not abandoned, it must be acknowledged that in the progress of nations negroes have shown less capacity for government than any other race of people. No independent Government of any form has ever been successful in their hands. On the contrary, wherever they have been left to their own devices they have shown a constant tendency to relapse into barbarism. In the southern States, however, Congress has undertaken to confer upon them the privilege of the ballot. Just released from slavery, it may be doubted whether, as a class, they know more than their ancestors how to organize and regulate civil society. Indeed, it is admitted that the blacks of the South are not only regardless of the rights of property, but so utterly ignorant of public affairs that their voting can consist in nothing more than carrying a ballot to the place where they are directed to deposit it. I need not remind you that the exercise of the elective franchise is the highest attribute of an American citizen, and that, when guided by virtue, intelligence, patriotism, and a proper appreciation of our free institutions, it constitutes the true basis of a democratic form of government, in which the sovereign power is lodged in the body of the people. A trust artificially created, not for its own sake, but solely as a means of promoting the general welfare, its influence for good must necessarily depend upon the elevated character and true allegiance of the elector. It ought, therefore, to be reposed in none except those who are fitted morally and mentally to administer it well; for if conferred upon persons who do not justly estimate its value, and who are indifferent as to its results, it will only serve as a means of placing power in the hands of the unprincipled and ambitious, and must eventuate in the complete destruction of that liberty of which it should be the most powerful conservator. I have, therefore, heretofore urged upon your attention the great danger "to be apprehended from an untimely extension of the elective franchise to any new class in our country, especially when the large majority of that class, in wielding the power thus placed in their hands, cannot be expected correctly to comprehend the duties and responsibilities which pertain to suffrage. Yesterday, as it were, four million persons were held in a condition of slavery that had existed for generations; to-day they are freemen; and are assumed by law to be citizens. It cannot be presumed, from their previous condition of servitude, that, as a class, they are as well informed as to the nature of our Government as the intelligent foreigner who makes our land the home of his choice. In the case of the latter, neither a residence of five years, and the knowledge of our institutions which it gives, nor attachment to the principles of the Constitution, are the only conditions upon which he can be admitted to citizenship. He must prove, in addition, a good moral character, and thus give reasonable ground for the belief that he will be faithful to the obligations which he assumes as a citizen of the Republic. Where a people—the source of all political power—speak, by their suffrages, through the instrumentality of the ballot-box, it must be carefully guarded against the control of those who are corrupt in principle and enemies of free institutions, for it can only become to our political and social system a safe conductor of healthy popular sentiment when kept free from demoralizing influences. Controlled, through fraud and usurpation, by the designing, anarchy and despotism must inevitably follow. In the hands of the patriotic and worthy, our Government will be preserved upon the principles of the Constitution inherited from our fathers. It follows, therefore, that in admitting to the ballot-box a new class of voters not qualified for the exercise of the elective franchise, we weaken our system of Government, instead of adding to its strength and durability." "I yield to no one in attachment to that rule of general suffrage which distinguishes our policy as a nation. But there is a limit, wisely observed hitherto, which makes the ballot a privilege and a trust, and which requires of some classes a time suitable for probation and preparation. To give it indiscriminately to a new class wholly unprepared by previous habits and opportunities to perform the trust which it demands is to degrade it, and finally to destroy its power; for it may be safely assumed that no political truth is better established than that such indiscriminate and all-embracing extension of popular suffrage must end at last in its overthrow and destruction."

I repeat the expression of my willingness to join in any plan within the scope of our constitutional authority which promises to better the condition of the negroes in the South, by encouraging them in industry, enlightening their minds, improving their morals, and giving protection to all their just rights as freemen. But the transfer of our political inheritance to them would, in my opinion, be an abandonment of a duty which we owe alike to the memory of our fathers and the rights of our children.

The plan of putting the southern States wholly, and the General Government partially, into the hands of negroes, is proposed at a time peculiarly unpropitious. The foundations of society have been broken up by civil war. Industry must be reorganized, justice reestablished, public credit maintained, and order brought out of confusion. To accomplish these ends would require all the wisdom and virtue of the great men who formed our institutions originally. I confidently believe that their descendants will be equal to the arduous task before them, but it is worse than madness to expect that negroes will perform it for us. Certainly we ought not to ask their assistance until we despair of our own competency.

The great difference between the two races in physical, mental, and moral characteristics will prevent an amalgamation or fusion of them together in one homogeneous mass. If the inferior obtains the ascendancy over the other, it will govern with reference only to its own interests—for it will recognize no common interest—and create such a tyranny as this continent has never yet witnessed. Already the negroes are influenced by promises of confiscation and plunder. They are taught to regard as an enemy every white man who has any respect for the rights of his own race. If this continues, it must become worse and worse, until all order will be subverted, all industry cease, and the fertile fields of the South grow up into a wilderness. Of all the dangers which our nation has yet encountered none are equal to those which must result from the success of the effort now making to Africanize the half of our country.

I would not put considerations of money in competition with justice and right. But the expenses incident to "reconstruction" under the system adopted by Congress aggravate what I regard as the intrinsic wrong of the measure itself. It has cost uncounted millions already, and if persisted in will add largely to the weight of taxation, already too oppressive to be borne without just complaint, and may finally reduce the Treasury of the nation to a condition of bankruptcy. We must not delude ourselves. It will require a strong standing army, and probably more than two hundred million dollars per annum to maintain the supremacy of negro governments after they are established. The sum thus thrown away would, if properly used, form a sinking fund large enough to pay the whole national debt in less than fifteen years. It is vain to hope that negroes will maintain their ascendancy themselves. Without military power they are wholly incapable of holding in subjection the white people of the South.

I submit to the judgment of Congress whether the public credit may not be injuriously affected by a system of measures like this. With our debt, and the vast private interests which are complicated with it, we cannot be too cautious of a policy which might, by possibility, impair the confidence of the world in our Government. That confidence can only be retained by carefully inculcating the principles of justice and honor on the popular mind, and by the most scrupulous fidelity to all our engagements of every sort. Any serious breach of the organic law persisted in for a considerable time cannot but create fears for the stability of our institutions. Habitual violation of prescribed rules which we bind ourselves to observe must demoralize the people. Our only standard of civil duty being set at naught, the sheet-anchor of our political morality is lost; the public conscience swings from its moorings and yields to every impulse of passion and interest. If we repudiate the Constitution we will not be expected to care much for mere pecuniary obligations. The violation of such a pledge as we made on the 22d day of July, 1861, will assuredly diminish the market value of our other promises. Besides, if we now acknowledge that the national debt was created, not to hold the States in the Union, as the tax-payers were led to suppose, but to expel them from it and hand them over to be governed by negroes, the moral duty to pay it may seem much less clear. I say it may seem so; for I do not admit that this or any other argument in favor of repudiation can be entertained as sound; but its influence on some classes of minds may well be apprehended. The financial honor of a great commercial nation, largely indebted, and with a republican form of government administered by agents of the popular choice, is a thing of such delicate texture, and the destruction of it would be followed by such unspeakable calamity, that every true patriot must desire to avoid whatever might expose it to the slightest danger.

The great interests of the country require immediate relief from these enactments. Business in the South is paralyzed by a sense of general insecurity, by the terror of confiscation, and the dread of negro supremacy. The southern trade, from which the North would have derived so great a profit under a government of law, still languishes, and can never be revived until it ceases to be fettered by the arbitrary power which makes all its operations unsafe. That rich country—the richest in natural resources the world ever saw—is worse than lost if it be not soon placed under the protection of a free Constitution. Instead of being, as it ought to be, a source of wealth and power, it will become an intolerable burden upon the rest of the nation.

Another reason for retracing our steps will doubtless be seen by Congress in the late manifestations of public opinion upon this subject. We live in a country where the popular will always enforces obedience to itself, sooner or later. It is vain to think of opposing it with anything short of legal authority, backed by overwhelming force. It cannot have escaped your attention that from the day on which Congress fairly and formally presented the proposition to govern the southern States by military force, with a view to the ultimate establishment of negro supremacy, every expression of the general sentiment has been more or less adverse to it. The affections of this generation cannot be detached from the institutions of their ancestors. Their determination to preserve the inheritance of free government in their own hands and transmit it undivided and unimpaired to their own posterity is too strong to be successfully opposed. Every weaker passion will disappear before that love of liberty and law for which the American people are distinguished above all others in the world.

How far the duty of the President "to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution" requires him to go in opposing an unconstitutional act of Congress is a very serious and important question, on which I have deliberated much, and felt extremely anxious to reach a proper conclusion. Where an act has been passed according to the forms of the Constitution by the supreme legislative authority, and is regularly enrolled among the public statutes of the country, executive resistance to it, especially in times of high party excitement, would be likely to produce violent collision between the respective adherents of the two branches of the Government. This would be simply civil war; and civil war must be resorted to only as the last remedy for the worst of evils. Whatever might tend to provoke it should be most carefully avoided. A faithful and conscientious magistrate will concede very much to honest error, and something even to perverse malice, before he will endanger the public peace; and he will not adopt forcible measures, or such as might lead to force, as long as those which are peaceable remain open to him or to his constituents. It is true that cases may occur in which the Executive would be compelled to stand on his rights, and maintain them, regardless of all consequences. If Congress should pass an act which is not only in palpable conflict with the Constitution, but will certainly, if carried out, produce immediate and irreparable injury to the organic structure of the Government, and if there be neither judicial remedy for the wrongs it inflicts nor power in the people to protect themselves without the official aid of their elected defender: if, for instance, the legislative department should pass an act even through all the forms of law to abolish a coordinate department of the Government; in such a case the President must take the high responsibilities of his office, and save the life of the nation at all hazards. The so-called reconstruction acts, though as plainly unconstitutional as any that can be imagined, were not believed to be within the class last mentioned. The people were not wholly disarmed of the power of self-defense. In all the northern States they still held in their hands the sacred right of the ballot, and it was safe to believe that in due time they would come to the rescue of their own institutions. It gives me pleasure to add that the appeal to our common constituents was not taken in vain, and that my confidence in their wisdom and virtue seems not to have been misplaced.

It is well and publicly known that enormous frauds have been perpetrated on the Treasury, and that colossal fortunes have been made at the public expense. This species of corruption has increased, is increasing, and, if not diminished, will soon bring us into total ruin and disgrace. The public creditors and the tax-payers are alike interested in an honest administration of the finances; neither class will long endure the large-handed robberies of the recent past. For this discreditable state of things there are several causes. Some of the taxes are so laid as to present an irresistible temptation to evade payment. The great sums which officers may win by connivance at fraud create a pressure which is more than the virtue of many can withstand; and there can be no doubt that the open disregard of constitutional obligations avowed by some of the highest and most influential men in the country has greatly weakened the moral sense of those who serve in subordinate places. The expenses of the United States, including interest on the public debt, are more than six times as much as they were seven years ago. To collect and disburse this vast amount requires careful supervision as well as systematic vigilance. The system, never perfected, was much disorganized by the "tenure-of-office bill," which has almost destroyed official accountability. The President may be thoroughly convinced that an officer is incapable, dishonest, or unfaithful to the Constitution, but, under the law which I have named, the utmost he can do is to complain to the Senate, and ask the privilege of supplying his place with a better man. If the Senate be regarded as personally or politically hostile to the President, it is natural, and not altogether unreasonable, for the officer to expect that it will take his part as far as possible, restore him to his place, and give him a triumph over his executive superior. The officer has other chances of impunity arising from accidental defects of evidence, the mode of investigating it, and the secrecy of the hearing. It is not wonderful that official malfeasance should become bold in proportion as the delinquents learn to think themselves safe. I am entirely persuaded that under such a rule the President cannot perform the great duty assigned to him of seeing the laws faithfully executed, and that it disables him most especially from enforcing that rigid accountability which is necessary to the due execution of the revenue laws.

The Constitution invests the President with authority to decide whether a removal should be made in any given case; the act of Congress declares, in substance, that he shall only accuse such as he supposes to be unworthy of their trust. The Constitution makes him sole judge in the premises; but the statute takes away his jurisdiction, transfers it to the Senate, and leaves him nothing but the odious and sometimes impracticable duty of becoming a prosecutor. The prosecution is to be conducted before a tribunal whose members are not, like him, responsible to the whole people, but to separate constituent bodies, and who may bear his accusation with great disfavor. The Senate is absolutely without any known standard of decision applicable to such a case. Its judgment cannot be anticipated, for it is not governed by any rule. The law does not define what shall be deemed good cause for removal. It is impossible even to conjecture what may or may not be so considered by the Senate. The nature of the subject forbids clear proof. If the charge be incapacity, what evidence will support it? Fidelity to the Constitution may be understood or misunderstood in a thousand different ways, and by violent party men, in violent party times, unfaithfulness to the Constitution may even come to be considered meritorious. If the officer be accused of dishonesty how shall it be made out? Will it be inferred from acts unconnected with public duty, from private history, or from general reputation? Or must the President await the commission of an actual misdemeanor in office? Shall he, in the mean time, risk the character and interests of the nation in the hands of men to whom he cannot give his confidence? Must he forbear his complaint until the mischief is done and cannot be prevented? If his zeal in the public service should impel him to anticipate the overt act, must he move at the peril of being tried himself for the offense of slandering his subordinate? In the present circumstances of the country some one must be held responsible for official delinquency of every kind. It is extremely difficult to say where that responsibility should be thrown if it be not left where it has been placed by the Constitution. But all just men will admit that the President ought to be entirely relieved from such responsibility if he cannot meet it by reason of restrictions placed by law upon his action.

The unrestricted power of removal from office is a very great one to be trusted even to a magistrate chosen by the general suffrage of the whole people, and accountable directly to them for his acts. It is undoubtedly liable to abuse, and at some period of our history perhaps has been abused. If it be thought desirable and constitutional that it should be so limited as to make the President merely a common informer against other public agents he should at least be permitted to act in that capacity before some open tribunal, independent of party politics, ready to investigate the merits of every case furnished with the means of taking evidence, and bound to decide according to established rules. This would guaranty the safety of the accuser when he acts in good faith, and at the same time secure the rights of the other party. I speak, of course, with all proper respect for the present Senate, but it does not seem to me that any legislative body can be so constituted as to insure its fitness for these functions.

It is not the theory of this Government that public offices are the property of those who hold them. They are given merely as a trust for the public benefit, sometimes for a fixed period, sometimes during good behavior, but generally they are liable to be terminated at the pleasure of the appointing power, which represents the collective majesty and speaks the will of the people. The forced retention in office of a single dishonest person may work great injury to the public interests. The danger to the public service comes not from the power to remove, but from the power to appoint. Therefore it was that the framers of the Constitution left the power of removal unrestricted, while they gave the Senate a right to reject all appointments which, in its opinion, were not fit to be made. A little reflection on this subject will probably satisfy all who have the good of the country at heart that our best course is to take the Constitution for our guide, walk in the path marked out by the founders of the Republic, and obey the rules made sacred by the observance of our great predecessors.

The present condition of our finances and circulating medium is one to which your early consideration is invited.

The proportion which the currency of any country should bear to the whole value of the annual produce circulated by its means is a question upon which political economists have not agreed. Nor can it be controlled by legislation, but must be left to the irrevocable laws which everywhere regulate commerce and trade. The circulating medium will ever irresistibly flow to those points where it is in greatest demand. The law of demand and supply is as unerring as that which regulates the tides of the ocean; and indeed currency, like the tides, has its ebbs and flows throughout the commercial world.

At the beginning of the rebellion the bank-note circulation of the country amounted to not much more than two hundred million dollars; now the circulation of national bank notes and those known as "legal tenders" is nearly seven hundred millions. While it is urged by some that this amount should be increased others contend that a decided reduction is absolutely essential to the best interests of the country. In view of these diverse opinions it may be well to ascertain the real value of our paper issues when compared with a metallic or convertible currency. For this purpose let us inquire how much gold and silver could be purchased by the seven hundred millions of paper money now in circulation. Probably not more than half the amount of the latter—showing that when our paper currency is compared with gold and silver its commercial value is compressed into three hundred and fifty millions. This striking fact makes it the obvious duty of the Government, as early as may be consistent with the principles of sound political economy, to take such measures as will enable the holder of its notes and those of the national banks to convert them, without loss, into specie or its equivalent. A reduction of our paper circulating medium need not necessarily follow. This, however, would depend upon the law of demand and supply, though it should be borne in mind that by making legal tender and bank notes convertible into coin or its equivalent their present specie value in the hands of their holders would be enhanced one hundred per cent.

Legislation for the accomplishment of a result so desirable is demanded by the highest public considerations. The Constitution contemplates that the circulating medium of the country shall be uniform in quality and value. At the time of the formation of that instrument the country had just emerged from the war of the Revolution, and was suffering from the effects of a redundant and worthless paper currency. The sages of that period were anxious to protect their posterity from the evils which they themselves had experienced. Hence, in providing a circulating medium, they conferred upon Congress the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, at the same time prohibiting the States from making anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts.

The anomalous condition of our currency is in striking contrast with that which was originally designed. Our circulation now embraces, first, notes of the national banks, which are made receivable for all dues to the Government, excluding imposts, and by all its creditors, excepting in payment of interests upon its bonds and the securities themselves; second, legal-tender notes, issued by the United States, and which the law requires shall be received as well in payment of all debts between citizens as of all Government dues excepting imposts; and, third, gold and silver coin. By the operation of our present system of finance, however, the metallic currency, when collected, is reserved only for one class of Government creditors, who, holding its bonds, semi-annually receive their interest in coin from the national Treasury. They are thus made to occupy an invidious position, which may be used to strengthen the arguments of those who would bring into disrepute the obligations of the nation. In the payment of all its debts the plighted faith of the Government should be inviolably maintained. But while it acts with fidelity toward the bond-holder who loaned his money that the integrity of the Union might be preserved, it should at the same time observe good faith with the great masses of the people, who, having rescued the Union from the perils of rebellion, now bear the burdens of taxation that the Government may be able to fulfill its engagements. There is no reason which will be accepted as satisfactory by the people why those who defend us on the land and protect us on the sea; the pensioner upon the gratitude of the nation, bearing the scars and wounds received while in its service; the public servants in the various departments of the Government; the farmer who supplies the soldiers of the Army and the sailors of the Navy; the artisan who toils in the nation's workshops, or the mechanics and laborers who build its edifices and construct its forts and vessels of war, should, in payment of their just and hard-earned dues receive depreciated paper while another class of their countrymen, no more deserving, are paid in coin of gold and silver. Equal and exact justice requires that all the creditors of the Government should be paid in a currency possessing a uniform value. This can only be accomplished by the restoration of the currency to the standard established by the Constitution; and by this means we would remove a discrimination which may, if it has not already done so, create a prejudice that may become deep-rooted and wide-spread, and imperil the national credit.

The feasibility of making our currency correspond with the constitutional standard may be seen by reference to a few facts derived from our commercial statistics.

The production of precious metals in the United States from 1849 to 1857, inclusive, amounted to $579,000,000; from 1858 to 1860, inclusive, to $137,500,000; and from 1861 to 1867, inclusive, to $457,500,000—making the grand aggregate of products since 1849 $1,174,000,000. The amount of specie coined from 1849 to 1857, inclusive, was $439,000,000; from 1858 to 1860, inclusive, $125,000,000; and from 1861 to 1867, inclusive, $310,000,000—making the total coinage since 1849 $874,- 000,000. From 1849 to 1857, inclusive, the net exports of specie amounted to $271,000,000; from 1858 to 1860, inclusive, to $148,000,000; and from 1861 to 1867, inclusive, $322,000,000—making the aggregate of net exports since 1849 $741,000,000. These figures show an excess of product over net exports of $433,000,000. There are in the Treasury $111,000,000 in coin, something more than $40,000,000 in circulation on the Pacific coast, and a few millions in the national and other banks—in all about $160,000,000. This, however, taking into account the specie in the country prior to 1849, leaves more than three hundred million dollars which have not been accounted for by exportation, and therefore may yet remain in the country.

These are important facts, and show how completely the inferior currency will supersede the better, forcing it from circulation among the masses, and causing it to be exported as a mere article of trade, to add to the money capital of foreign lands. They show the necessity of retiring our paper money, that the return of gold and silver to the avenues of trade may be invited, and a demand created which will cause the retention at home of at least so much of the productions of our rich and inexhaustible gold-bearing fields as may be sufficient for purposes of circulation. It is unreasonable to expect a return to a sound currency so long as the Government, by continuing to issue irredeemable notes, fills the channels of circulation with depreciated paper. Notwithstanding a coinage by our mints since 1849 of $874,000,000, the people are now strangers to the currency which was designed for their use and benefit, and specimens of the precious metals bearing the national device are seldom seen, except when produced to gratify the interest excited by their novelty. If depreciated paper is to be continued as the permanent currency of the country, and all our coin is to become a mere article of traffic and speculation, to the enhancement in price of all that is indispensable to the comfort of the people, it would be wise economy to abolish our mints, thus saving the nation the care and expense incident to such establishments, and let all our precious metals be exported in bullion. The time has come, however, when the Government and national banks should be required to take the most efficient steps and make all necessary arrangements for a resumption of specie payments at the earliest practicable period. Specie payments having been once resumed by the Government and banks, all notes or bills of paper issued by either of a less denomination than twenty dollars should by law be excluded from circulation, so that the people may have the benefit and convenience of a gold and silver currency which in all their business transactions will be uniform in value at home and abroad.

"Every man of property or industry, every man who desires to preserve what he honestly possesses, or to obtain what he can honestly earn, has a direct interest in maintaining a safe circulating medium; such a medium as shall be real and substantial, not liable to vibrate with opinions, not subject to be blown up or blown down by the breath of speculation, but to be made stable and secure. A disordered currency is one of the greatest political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness; it wars against industry, frugality, and economy; and it fosters the evil spirits of extravagance and speculation." It has been asserted by one of our profound and most gifted statesmen that "of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's fields by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation—these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community compared with a fraudulent currency, and the robberies committed by depreciated paper." Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression on the virtuous and well-disposed of a degraded paper currency, authorized by law or in any way countenanced by Government." It is one of the most successful devices in times of peace or war, expansions or revulsions, to accomplish the transfer of all the precious metals from the great mass of the people into the hands of the few, where they are hoarded in secret places or deposited in strong boxes under bolts and bars, while the people are left to endure all the inconvenience, sacrifice, and demoralization resulting from the use of a depreciated and worthless paper money.

The condition of our finances and the operations of our revenue system are set forth and fully explained in the able and instructive report of the Secretary of the Treasury. On the 30th of June, 1866, the public debt amounted to $2,783,425,879; on the 30th of June last it was $2,692,199,215, showing a reduction during the fiscal year of $91,226,664. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, the receipts were $490,634,010, and the expenditures $346,729,129, leaving an available surplus of $143,904,880. It is estimated that the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, will be $417,161,928, and that the expenditures will reach the sum of $393,269,226, leaving in the Treasury a surplus of $28,892,702. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, it is estimated that the receipts will amount to $381,000,000, and that the expenditures will be $372,000,000, showing an excess of $9,000,000 in favor of the Government.

The attention of Congress is earnestly invited to the necessity of a thorough revision of our revenue system. Our internal revenue laws and impost system should be so adjusted as to bear most heavily on articles of luxury, leaving the necessities of life as free from taxation as may be consistent with the real wants of the Government, economically administered. Taxation would not then fall unduly on the man of moderate means; and while none would be entirely exempt from assessment, all, in proportion to their pecuniary abilities, would contribute toward the support of the State. A modification of the internal revenue system, by a large reduction in the number of articles now subject to tax, would be followed by results equally advantageous to the citizen and the Government. It would render the execution of the law less expensive and more certain, remove obstructions to industry, lessen the temptations to evade the law, diminish the violations and frauds perpetrated upon its provisions, make its operation less inquisitorial, and greatly reduce in numbers the army of tax-gatherers created by the system, who "take from the mouth of honest labor the bread it has earned." Retrenchment, reform, and economy should be carried into every branch of the public service, that the expenditures of the Government may be reduced and the people relieved from oppressive taxation; a sound currency should be restored, and the public faith in regard to the national debt sacredly observed. The accomplishment of these important results, together with the restoration of the Union of the States upon the principles of the Constitution, would inspire confidence at home and abroad in the stability of our institutions and bring to the nation prosperity, peace, and good will.

The report of the Secretary of War ad interim exhibits the operations of the Army and of the several bureaus of the War Department. The aggregate strength of our military force on the 30th of September last was 56,315. The total estimate for military appropriations is $77,124,707, including a deficiency in last year's appropriation of $13,600,000. The payments at the Treasury on account of the service of the War Department from January 1 to October 29, 1867—a period of ten months—amounted to $109,807,000. The expenses of the military establishment, as well as the numbers of the Army, are now three times as great as they have ever been in time of peace; while the discretionary power is vested in the Executive to add millions to this expenditure by an increase of the Army to the maximum strength allowed by the law.

The comprehensive report of the Secretary of the Interior furnishes interesting information in reference to the important branches of the public service connected with his Department.

The menacing attitude of some of the warlike bands of Indians inhabiting the district of country between the Arkansas and Platte rivers, and portions of Dakota Territory, required the presence of a large military force in that region. Instigated by real or imaginary grievances the Indians occasionally committed acts of barbarous violence upon emigrants and our frontier settlements; but a general Indian war has been providentially averted. The commissioners under the act of 20th July, 1867, were invested with full power to adjust existing difficulties, negotiate treaties with the disaffected bands, and select for them reservations remote from the traveled routes between the Mississippi and the Pacific. They entered without delay upon the execution of their trust, but have not yet made any official report of their proceedings. It is of vital importance that our distant Territories should be exempt from Indian outbreaks, and that the construction of the Pacific railroad, an object of national importance, should not be interrupted by hostile tribes. These objects, as well as the material interests and the moral and intellectual improvement of the Indians, can be most effectually secured by concentrating them upon portions of country set apart for their exclusive use, and located at points remote from our highways and encroaching white settlements.

Since the commencement of the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress five hundred and ten miles of road have been constructed on the main line and branches of the Pacific railway. The line from Omaha is rapidly approaching the eastern base of the Rocky mountains, while the terminus of the last section of constructed road in California, accepted by the Government on the 24th day of October last, was but eleven miles distant from the summit of the Sierra Nevada. The remarkable energies evinced by the companies offer the strongest assurance that the completion of the road from Sacramento to Omaha will not be long deferred.

During the last fiscal year seven million forty-one thousand one hundred and fourteen acres of public land were disposed of, and the cash receipts from sales and fees exceeded by $500,000 the sum realized from those sources during the preceding year. The amount paid to pensioners, including expenses of disbursements, was $18,619,956, and thirty-six thousand four hundred and eighty-two names were added to the rolls. The entire number of pensioners on the 30th of June last was one hundred and fifty-five thousand four hundred and seventy-four. Eleven thousand six hundred and fifty-five patents and designs were issued during the year ending September 30, 1867, and at that date the balance in the Treasury to the credit of the patent fund was $286,607.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy states that we have seven squadrons actively and judiciously employed, under efficient and able commanders, in protecting the persons and property of American citizens, maintaining the dignity and power of the Government, and promoting the commerce and business interests of our countrymen in every part of the world. Of the two hundred and thirty-eight vessels composing the present Navy of the United States, fifty-six, carrying five hundred and seven guns, are in squadron service. During the year the number of vessels in commission has been reduced twelve, and there are thirteen less on squadron duty than there were at the date of the last report. A large number of vessels were commenced and in the course of construction when the war terminated, and although Congress had made the necessary appropriations for their completion the Department has either suspended work upon them or limited the slow completion of the steam vessels so as to meet the contracts for machinery made with private establishments. The total expenditures of the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, were $31,034,011. No appropriations have been made or required since the close of the war for the construction and repair of vessels, for steam machinery, ordnance, provisions and clothing, fuel, hemp, &c., the balances under these several heads having been more than sufficient for current expenditures. It should also be stated to the credit of the Department that, besides asking no appropriations for the above objects for the last two years, the Secretary of the Navy, on the 30th of September last, in accordance with the act of May 1, 1820, requested the Secretary of the Treasury to carry to the surplus fund the sum of $65,000,000, being the amount received from the sales of vessels and other war property and the remnants of former appropriations.

The report of the Postmaster General shows the business of the Post Office Department and the condition of the postal service in a very favorable light, and the attention of Congress is called to its practical recommendations. The receipts of the Department for the year ending June 30, 1867, including all special appropriations for sea and land service and for free mail matter, were $19,978,693. The expenditures for all purposes were $19,235,483, leaving an unexpended balance in favor of the Department of $743,210, which can be applied toward the expenses of the Department for the current year. The increase of postal revenue, independent of specific appropriations, for the year 1867 over that of 1866 was $850,040. The increase of revenue from the sale of stamps and stamped envelopes was $783,404. The increase of expenditures for 1867 over those of the previous year was owing chiefly to the extension of the land and ocean mail service. During the past year new postal conventions have been ratified and exchanged with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, the North German Union, Italy, and the Colonial Government at Hong Kong, reducing very largely the rates of ocean and land postages to and from and within those countries.

The report of the Acting Commissioner of Agriculture concisely presents the condition, wants, and progress of an interest eminently worthy the fostering care of Congress, and exhibits a large measure of useful results achieved during the year to which it refers.

The reestablishment of peace at home and the resumption of extended trade, travel, and commerce abroad have served to increase the number and variety of questions in the Department for Foreign Affairs. None of these questions, however, have seriously disturbed our relations with other States.

The Republic of Mexico, having been relieved from foreign intervention, is earnestly engaged in efforts to reestablish her constitutional system of government. A good understanding continues to exist between our Government and the republics of Hayti and San Domingo, and our cordial relations with the Central and South American States remain unchanged. The tender, made in conformity with a resolution of Congress, of the good offices of the Government, with a view to an amicable adjustment of peace between Brazil and her allies on one side and Paraguay on the other, and between Chili and her allies on the one side and Spain on the other, though kindly received, has in neither case been fully accepted by the belligerents. The war in the Valley of the Parana is still vigorously maintained. On the other hand, actual hostilities between the Pacific States and Spain have been more than a year suspended. I shall, on any proper occasion that may occur, renew the conciliatory recommendations which have been already made. Brazil, with enlightened sagacity and comprehensive statesmanship, has opened the great channels of the Amazon and its tributaries to universal commerce. One thing more seems needful to assure a rapid and cheering progress in South America. I refer to those peaceful habits without which States and nations cannot, in this age, well expect material prosperity or social advancement.

The Exposition of Universal Industry at Paris has passed, and seems to have fully realized the high expectations of the French Government. If due allowance be made for the recent political derangement of industry here, the part which the United States has borne in this exhibition of invention and art may be regarded with very high satisfaction. During the Exposition a conference was held of delegates from several nations, the United States being one, in which the inconveniences of commerce and social intercourse resulting from the diverse standards of money value were very fully discussed, and plans were developed for establishing, by universal consent, a common principle for the coinage of gold. These conferences are expected to be renewed, with the attendance of many foreign States not hitherto represented. A report of these interesting proceedings will be submitted to Congress, which will no doubt justly appreciate the great object, and be ready to adopt any measure which may tend to facilitate its ultimate accomplishment.

On the 25th of February, 1862, Congress declared by law that Treasury notes without interest, authorized by that act, should be legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States. An annual remittance of $30,000, less stipulated expenses, accrues to claimants under the Convention made with Spain in 1834. These remittances, since the passage of that act, have been paid in such notes. The claimants insist that the Government ought to require payment in coin. The subject may be deemed worthy of your attention.

No arrangement has as yet been reached for the settlement of our claims for British depredations upon the commerce of the United States. I have felt it my duty to decline the proposition of arbitration made by her majesty's Government, because it has hitherto been accompanied by reservations and limitations incompatible with the rights, interest, and honor of our country. It is not to be apprehended that Great Britain will persist in her refusal to satisfy these just and reasonable claims, which involve the sacred principle of non-intervention—a principle henceforth not more important to the United States than to all other commercial nations.

The West India Islands were settled and colonized by European States simultaneously with the settlement and colonization of the American continent. Most of the colonies planted here became independent nations in the close of the last and the beginning of the present century. Our own country embraces communities which at one period were colonies of Great Britain, France, Spain, Holland, Sweden, and Russia. The people in the West Indies, with the exception of those of the island of Hayti, have neither attained nor aspired to independence, nor have they become prepared for self-defense. Although possessing considerable commercial value, they have been held by the several European States which colonized or at some time conquered them chiefly for purposes of military and naval strategy in carrying out European policy and designs in regard to this continent. In our revolutionary war ports and harbors in the West India Islands were used by our enemy to the great injury and embarrassment of the United States. We had the same experience in our second war with Great Britain. The same European policy for a long time excluded us even from trade with the West Indies while we were at peace with all nations. In our recent civil war the rebels and their piratical and blockade-breaking allies found facilities in the same ports for the work, which they too successfully accomplished, of injuring and devastating the commerce which we are now engaged in rebuilding. We labored especially under this disadvantage—that European steam vessels, employed by our enemies, found friendly shelter, protection, and supplies in West Indian ports, while our own naval operations were necessarily carried on from our own distant shores. There was then a universal feeling of the want of an advanced naval outpost between the Atlantic coast and Europe. The duty of obtaining such an outpost peacefully and lawfully, while neither doing nor menacing injury to other States, earnestly engaged the attention of the executive department before the close of the war, and it has not been lost sight of since that time. A not entirely dissimilar naval want revealed itself during the same period on the Pacific coast. The required foothold there was fortunately secured by our late treaty with the Emperor of Russia, and it now seems imperative that the more obvious necessities of the Atlantic coast should be not less carefully provided for. A good and convenient port and harbor, capable of easy defense, will supply that want. With the possession of such a station by the United States neither we nor any other American nation need longer apprehend injury or offense from any trans-Atlantic enemy. I agree with our early statesmen that the West Indies naturally gravitate to, and may be expected ultimately to be absorbed by, the continental States, including our own. I agree with them also that it is wise to leave the question of such absorption to this process of natural political gravitation. The islands of St. Thomas and St. John's, which constitute a part of the group called the Virgin Islands, seemed to offer us advantages immediately desirable, while their acquisition could be secured in harmony with the principles to which I have alluded. A treaty has, therefore, been concluded with the King of Denmark for the cession of those islands, and will be submitted to the Senate for consideration.

It will hardly be necessary to call the attention of Congress to the subject of providing for the payment to Russia of the sum stipulated in the treaty for the cession of Alaska. Possession having been formally delivered to our commissioner, the territory remains for the present in care of a military force, awaiting such civil organization as shall be directed by Congress.

The annexation of many small German States to Prussia, and the reorganization of that country under a new and liberal constitution, have induced me to renew the effort to obtain a just and prompt settlement of the long-vested question concerning the claims of foreign States for military service from their subjects naturalized in the United States.

In connection with this subject the attention of Congress is respectfully called to a singular and embarrassing conflict of laws. The executive department of this Government has hitherto uniformly held, as it now holds, that naturalization, in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States, absolves the recipient from his native allegiance. The courts of Great Britain hold that allegiance to the British Crown is indefeasible, and is not absolved by our laws of naturalization. British judges cite courts and law authorities of the United States in support of that theory against the position held by the executive authority of the United States. This conflict perplexes the public mind concerning the rights of naturalized citizens, and impairs the national authority abroad. I called attention to this subject in my last annual message, and now again respectfully appeal to Congress to declare the national will unmistakably upon this important question.

The abuse of our laws by the clandestine prosecution of the African slave-trade from American ports or by American citizens has altogether ceased, and, under existing circumstances, no apprehensions of its renewal in this part of the world are entertained. Under these circumstances it becomes a question whether we shall not propose to her majesty's Government a suspension or discontinuance of the stipulations for maintaining a naval force for the suppression of that trade.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, December 3, 1867.

Report of the Secretary of War ad interim and General United States Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, November, 1867.

MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit my report as Secretary of War ad interim and the accompanying reports of the Army and bureaus under the War Department since the last annual report of the Secretary of War.

I assumed the duties of Secretary of War ad interim August 12, 1867, in pursuance of the following instructions from the President, to wit:

EXECUTIVE MANSION.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 12, 1867.

SIR: Hon. Edwin M. Stanton having been this day suspended as Secretary of War, you are hereby authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and will at once enter upon the discharge of the duties of that office.

The Secretary of War has been instructed to transfer to you all records, books, papers, and other public property now in his custody and charge.

Very respectfully, yours,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

General ULYSSES S. GRANT, Washington, D. C.

On receipt of the above I notified the Secretary of War of it, first verbally and then, at his suggestion, by letter, of which the following is a copy:

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., August 12, 1867.

SIR: Inclosed herewith I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a letter just received from the President of the United States notifying me of my assignment as Acting Secretary of War, and directing me to assume those duties at once.

In notifying you of my acceptance I cannot let the opportunity pass without expressing to you my appreciation of the zeal, patriotism, firmness, and ability with which you have ever discharged the duties of Secretary of War.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT, General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

To this the Secretary of War made this reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, August 12, 1867.

GENERAL: Your note of this date, accompanied by a copy of a letter addressed to you, August 12, by the President, appointing you Secretary of War ad interim, and informing me of your acceptance of the appointment, has been received.

Under a sense of public duty I am compelled to deny the President's right, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, to suspend me from office as Secretary of War, or to authorize any other person to enter upon the discharge of the duties of that office, or to require me to transfer to you or any other person the records, books, papers, and other property in my official custody and charge as Secretary of War.

But inasmuch as the President has assumed to suspend me from office as Secretary of War, and you have notified me of your acceptance of the appointment of Secretary of War ad interim, I have no alternative but to submit, under protest, to the superior force of the President.

You will please accept my acknowledgment of the kind terms in which you have notified me of your acceptance of the President's appointment, and my cordial reciprocation of the sentiments expressed.

I am, with sincere regard, truly yours,

EDWIN M. STANTON,

Secretary of War.

General ULYSSES S. GRANT.

Immediately after this exchange of notes I assumed the duties of the office assigned to me, in addition to the duties of General of the Army.

A long war had entailed upon the Army practices of extravagance totally unjustifiable in times of peace; and as the increase of the regular Army since 1860 (now almost the entire Army) is officered by men whose Army experience does not go back to that period, (and therefore they may not know but their indulgences at the expense of the General Government are all legitimate,) retrenchment was the first subject to attract my attention. During the rebellion ambulances and mounted orderlies at every headquarters had come into use; and since the rebellion they have been continued, if not at every post of a single company at least generally throughout the Army. A discontinuance of this evil was necessary both to the discipline and efficiency of the Army and to the relief of the Treasury. Orders were therefore given both for breaking it up and seeing to its execution.

The Bureau of Rebel Archives was transferred to the Adjutant General's department, as was also the Bureau for the Exchange of Prisoners, &c., thus relieving from Government employment a large number of clerks and several officers who had, to that date, been continued in service.

Supplying large armies for a period of four years of hostilities necessarily led to an accumulation of stores of all sorts far beyond the wants of our present establishment for many years to come. Many of these articles were of a perishable nature; besides being borne on the returns of officers accountable for them they had to be stored and guarded, although the cost of care per annum might be greater than their value. Under my direction all these surplus and useless stores in the quartermaster's department are being sold, and the balance distributed for issue to troops as they may be wanted. This releases a large number of storehouses for which rent is being paid, and also discharges a large number of civil employes of Government.

During the last summer and summer before I caused inspections to be made of the various routes of travel and supply through the territory between the Missouri river and the Pacific coast. The cost of maintaining troops in that section was so enormous that I desired, if possible, to reduce it. This I have been enabled to do, to some extent, from the information obtained by these inspections; but for the present the military establishment between the lines designated must be maintained at a great cost per man. The completion of the railroads to the Pacific will materially reduce this cost, as well as the number of men to be kept there. The completion of these roads will also go far toward a permanent settlement of our Indian difficulties. There is good reason to hope that negotiations now going on with the hostile tribes of Indians will result, if not in a permanent peace at least in a suspension of hostilities until the railroads are pushed through that portion of the Indian territory where they are giving the most trouble.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

From the report of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands I make the following synopsis:

No changes have been made in the organization and practical working of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, except such as have been caused by the appointment of district commanders under the reconstruction act.

The detail of officers serving with troops has enabled the Commissioner to reduce the number of bureau agents. Twenty-eight civil agents have been discharged and forty-eight mustered out.

The freedmen, as a people, are making rapid progress in education, in mechanic arts, and in all branches of industry.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

40TH CONG... 2D SESS.

The amount of "abandoned land" now in possession of the bureau is 215,024 acres, much of which is swampland, and scarcely any affording revenue. The number of pieces of town property is 950.

The business of adjusting the claims of colored soldiers has greatly increased in good results. The total number of claims presented during the year is 5,535, of which 755 have been finally adjusted, and 4,266 are now awaiting action in the Treasury Department. The amount collected and paid to claimants has been $64,494 29; certificates received by the Commissioner and ordered paid, under act of Congress approved March 29, 1867, amounting to $890,712 99.

Transportation has been furnished to 778 refugees, and to 10,931 freedmen to enable them to reach places where they can provide for themselves. Teachers and agents have also received transportation. Railroad accounts for transportation have been audited amounting to $102,093 99, and the amount paid by the disbursing officer has been $227,754 63.

Hospitals are being rapidly closed and dispensaries substituted as a more economical mode of giving relief to the sick. The number of refugees treated during the year ending August 31, 1867, is 8,853, of whom 196 died, or 2.2 per cent. The number of freedmen treated is 135,296; died, 4,640, or 3.4 per cent. The number of commissioned medical officers and private physicians employed by the bureau has been 178, of whom 105 were on duty at the end of the year. No adequate provision has been made for the insane, either by State or municipal authorities, but they are cared for in separate wards of bureau hospitals. The average cost of furnishing medical attendance and medicines during the year has been $2 73 for each patient.

The total expenditures for the medical department have been $301,800.

Commissary supplies have been issued to a limited extent. It has been found impracticable to discontinue such issues altogether. The average number of rations for the year ending September 1, 1867, was 11,658 per day. In the latter part of winter the destitution became so great that urgent appeals were made for a more general distribution of supplies. The total amount of supplies furnished by means of the "relief fund" has been 850,388 pounds of pork and bacon, and 6,809,296 pounds of corn. The number of persons receiving relief is reported to have been 233,372. The average number has been 58,000, the largest number being, in July, 82,000. The whole expense has been $445,993 86, i. e., nearly $8 to each person for the period of four months, or $2 per month. This special relief was discontinued in August, the funds and supplies remaining on hand being reserved for those who may require help during the coming winter.

The Schools have increased in number and usefulness. Normal and training schools are well attended. The total of day and night schools reported, including industrial, but not the Sunday schools, is 2,207, with 2,442 teachers and 130,735 scholars; an increase of 40,000 since the last annual report. Of these, 1,056 schools are sustained wholly or in part by freedmen, and 391 buildings are owned by them. Of the teachers, 699 are colored and 1,388 white.

The average amount of tuition paid per month by the freedmen has been $14,555.

Finances.—Appropriation for the year ending July 1, 1868, $3,838,300.

Total expenditures from October 1, 1866, to August 31, 1867, eleven months, $3,597,397 65.

The principal items of expenditures are: for schools and school buildings, $553,915 79; subsistence stores, $1,460,326 28; for transportation, $227,754 63; salaries of agents, clerks, &c., $521,421 44; medical department, $331,001 21; quarters and fuel, $135,098 64; clothing, $110,688 30.

The balance of the expenditure, $251,190 86, has been for printing, postage, and other contingencies.

The surplus from the unexpended appropriations of 1866, with the balance of the appropriations of this year, will be sufficient for the purposes of the bureau during the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1868. In addition to the above proper expenditures, the disbursing officer has paid back to colored soldiers, or their heirs, retained State bounties to the amount of $51,720 83, and has paid claims of colored soldiers, under joint resolution of Congress approved March 29, 1867, to the amount of $550,870 96.

Apprenticeship in Maryland still holds large numbers of colored children in virtual slavery. The evils and cruelties resulting from this system, sanctioned by the State laws, are matters of constant complaint. As many as two thousand cases have been presented in a single county.

Education.—In all the schools in the District of Columbia and West Virginia there have been 7,998 scholars and 229 teachers. In West Virginia the schools have been sustained in part from the public school fund, where an impartial system of free schools exists. In the District of Columbia the colored schools are also entitled to a proportionate share of the public school fund, but the city authorities have not yet paid the entire sum claimed. It is probable, however, that the trustees of the colored schools will recover all that is due, and in future receive an equitable share of the public funds, in which case the colored schools will be independent of the bureau. Several institutions of higher grade than common schools have been established, and have made a good beginning. Among these are the National Theological Institute, in Washington, under the auspices of the Baptist denomination; the normal school and college at Harper's Ferry, conducted by the Free-Will Baptists, and the Howard University, in the District of Columbia, which is designed to be national and free to all. The normal and preparatory department has been opened with about sixty scholars, and buildings are now being erected for other departments.

To provide cheap homes for industrious colored men, a farm has been purchased, surveyed into acre lots, and sold at cost. The lots have been taken up rapidly, and payments upon them promptly made.

Expenditures have fallen below the original estimates. No further appropriation of funds is asked for. As the bureau will expire next July, unless extended by Congress, no funds are estimated for the next fiscal year. In case the bureau is not extended, it is recommended by the Commissioner that proper arrangements be made with the State authorities for the care of indigent classes; that the educational work be continued under the direction of the Bureau of Education or other United States agency, with full power and means to maintain and extend the present system; and that the Claim Division be continued in connection with the War Department as long as it may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of War.

This is but a brief abstract of the report of the Commissioner of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands. Special attention to the report itself is respectfully invited. No recommendation is made at the present time respecting the continuance or discontinuance of this bureau. During the session of Congress facts may develop themselves requiring special legislation in the premises, when the necessary recommendations can be made.

ADJUTANT GENERAL.

The report of the Adjutant General of the Army shows the organization and present strength of the Army, the force stationed in each military department and district, the number of recruits enlisted, and desertions from October 1, 1866, to September 20, 1867, and the organization of the colored troops.

On the 30th of September, 1867, the aggregate strength of the Army (officers and men) was 56,815; the number of recruits, 34,191; and desertions, 13,608.

The recruiting service has been very successful, and men have been supplied as fast as needed.

The greatly enlarged numbers of the Army and of the military posts occupied by it render it necessary that some change should be made in the present system of courts-martial and of punishments. The organization of "companies of discipline" is recommended. It is also recommended that, for the good of the service, the term of enlistment be changed from three to five years. In the cavalry it is five years, but the other arms of the service only enlist for three.

At the date of the last report 11,043 volunteers still remained in service. That number has been reduced, and now only 203 commissioned officers remain, and no enlisted men. These officers are kept by special acts authorizing retention of volunteers in Freedmen's Bureau.

The mustering and disbursing officers have all been discontinued, except at Albany, New York; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Columbus, Ohio; Louisville, Kentucky; St. Louis, Missouri; Santa Fé, New Mexico; and San Francisco, California. No appropriation is required for the volunteer disbursing branch for the next year.

Attention is called to the great number of desertions, and the necessity for a change in the present system of courts-martial and of punishment to abate the evil.

I would recommend an increase of three assistant adjutants general. This would enable the assignment of one to each of the major generals and brigadier generals of the Army, and avoid the necessity of detaching officers from their legitimate duties to act as assistant adjutants general.

INSPECTOR GENERAL.

During the year there has been no change in the inspector general's department, except that two of the assistant inspectors general have been promoted from majors to lieutenant colonels, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866. The number of officers in this branch of the service is too small to properly make the required special and stated inspections, whereby many abuses and irregularities have crept into the service. The immediate organization of an inspection department, composed of competent, active officers, is respectfully recommended to the attention of the authorities.

THE CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE reports that in the Bureau of Military Justice, during the past year, 11,432 records of military courts were received, reviewed, and registered; 2,135 special reports made as to the regularity of judicial proceedings, the pardon of military offenders, the remission or commutation of sentences, and upon the miscellaneous subjects and questions of law referred for the opinion of the bureau. The only change made in the conduct of the bureau and the status of its officers during the year has been in the detailing, by the order of the Secretary of War, of the assistant judge advocate general and four judge advocates for service at the headquarters, respectively, of the five military districts established by the act of Congress of March 2, 1867. From official reports of the district commanders and other communications it is believed that the services of these officers have been of an important and valuable character. The satisfactory manner in which they are represented as having performed their duties, which have been both of an advisory and judicial character, is deemed especially to vindicate the policy of Congress in retaining in the Army a small body of officers instructed in military and common law, by constituting the corps of judge advocates a part of the permanent regular establishment.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL.

The Quartermaster General submits full financial statement and analysis of accounts for fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, showing that during the past year 11,130 accounts have been examined, amounting to $309,738,171 89, and of accounts remaining to be examined 1,544, amounting to $47,451,262 74.

Sixteen thousand and eighty-six horses and mules were purchased during the year for the public service.

The sales of surplus or unserviceable animals during the year amount to $268,572 24. The total sales of this character since the close of active hostilities in 1865 amount to $16,245,716 46.

The supply of clothing and equipage is so large that no purchases of these articles will be necessary for the next year.

The amount of clothing and equipage issued under the act of Congress approved July 14, 1866, to families rendered houseless and destitute by the recent conflagration in Portland, Maine, is fully set forth in report.

The fund of $1,000,000, known as the sheltering fund for the troops on the plains, has been applied to the purposes for which it was intended.

One thousand temporary buildings have been sold during the year for the sum of $112,000.

The erection of the fire-proof warehouse in Philadelphia is in process of construction. The contract price for building is $138,800. It will probably be ready for occupancy in December next.

The United States not owning any land at or near the city of Jeffersonville, Indiana, and no appropriation having been made to purchase land as a site for the buildings, no steps have been taken to execute the provisions of the fourth section of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1867, authorizing the erection of fire-proof buildings at that place.

There are 308 cemeteries in the United States in which are interred the bodies of United States soldiers. Eighty-one of these are known as "national cemeteries." The total number of United States soldiers interred in cemeteries is 251,827, of which 238,666 are interred in the national cemeteries. Seventy-six thousand two hundred and sixty-three bodies are yet to be interred in these cemeteries, which, when completed, will make the total number 328,090. Twenty thousand eight hundred and sixty-one rebel prisoners of war have been interred. The estimated cost for fencing the cemeteries is $709,000. The amount already expended on cemeteries is estimated at $1,737,000. The total cost of the cemeteries, when completed, is estimated at $3,500,000.

On July 1, 1866, the southern railroads were indebted to the Government to the amount of $6,570,074 05. June 30, 1867, this amount was reduced to $5,921,372 10.

The number of troops and the quantity of supplies transported up to the 20th September were as follows: passengers, 73,196; animals, 7,194; public freight, 306,576 tons, at a cost of 4,048,000.

During the fiscal year there were presented 24,417 claims, amounting to $13,924,764 10, of which—

5,408 claims were approved, amounting to.....	$5,440,041 48
6,513 claims were not allowed, amounting to.....	3,613,866 99
12,496 claims are awaiting action, amounting to.....	4,870,855 63
	$13,924,764 10

On the 1st of July, 1866, the organization of the department consisted of 67 officers and 12 military storekeepers, total 79. By the act approved July 28, 1866, the department was reorganized, and now consists of 76 officers and 16 military storekeepers with the rank of captain, making a total of 92. Five assistant quartermasters general have been retired. The number of volunteer officers in the department has been reduced from 107 to 81. Those remaining at the close of the year were fully employed upon important duties.

It is found that the number of officers of the quartermasters' department as authorized by the act of July 28, 1866, is insufficient to the prompt performance of the duties devolving upon them; it is therefore respectfully recommended that a portion of section thirteen of the act approved July 28, 1866, be repealed, and that there be added to the quartermasters' department so many assistant quartermasters with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry as will raise the number of officers of that grade to fifty; and that the vacancies thereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster shall be filled by selection from those persons who have rendered meritorious services in the military service of the United States as assistant quartermasters of volunteers in the late war.

All of the officers of the department are highly commended for the able, conscientious, and faithful manner in which they have all discharged the highly important duties devolving upon them in the various details of business pertaining to the department.

COMMISSARY GENERAL.

The Commissary General of Subsistence reports that during the past year subsistence stores for the Army have been procured in the usual manner, by advertising for proposals in the larger markets of the country. Efforts have been made with considerable success to obtain supplies from the producers and dealers established near the point of consumption. The completion and extension of the Union Pacific railroad already afford great facilities for reaching and supplying distant occupied posts heretofore supplied by trains of wagons at special seasons of the year. Recent reports from the military division of the Pacific give assurances of success in the efforts to supply the troops of that division with pork made on the coast. This article has heretofore been shipped from New York. Tobacco has been supplied to the enlisted men of the Army under the sixth section of the act of March 3, 1865, to the amount of $104,895 84. Subsistence to the amount of $882,634 66 has been furnished by this department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, to freedmen and others under the proper and authorized demands of the officers and agents of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands. The total cost of subsistence stores issued or transferred for the subsistence of Indians for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, is $644,430 22. The number of claims presented and paid under public resolution No. 56, approved July 25, 1866, up to September 12, 1867, was 2,069, and amounted to $116,187 75. The number presented and passed for payment under section three of the act of March 2, 1867, was five, and amounted to $259 50.

The total number of claims received under the third section of the act approved July 4, 1864, is 4,926, amounting to $2,493,257 45; of which number there have been examined and approved 482, amounting to $146,149 51; examined and rejected, 1,881, amounting to $1,071,194 42; leaving for final action and decision 2,563, amounting to $1,275,913 32.

The number of claims examined and decided since the last annual report is 1,190, amounting to $480,436 60; of which number there have been approved 248, amounting to $60,806 41; rejected, 942, amounting to $419,630 19.

The officers of the department have all performed their duties with zeal and ability.

All of the commissaries of subsistence of volunteers have now been mustered out except two, who are by authority of law on duty in the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.

No appropriation having been made to meet the large expenditures necessary to carry out the provisions of section twenty-five of the act approved July 28, 1866, an order was issued permitting sutlers to continue to trade with troops until further orders.

The law authorizing the appointment of commissaries of subsistence having expired, it is suggested that it be recommended to Congress to authorize the General commanding the Army to appoint from the lieutenants of the line, on the recommendation of the Commissary General of Subsistence, as many assistant commissaries of subsistence as the service may require, not to exceed thirty-two, such officers to be paid twenty dollars a month in addition to their proper pay and emoluments, but without loss of the fourth ration, and to hold their appointment until canceled by their promotion to the grade of captain or by order of the General.

It is also suggested that it would be highly beneficial to the service could there be authorized a grade of non-commissioned officers to be called post commissary sergeants, to be selected and appointed as are ordnance sergeants, and to have the same rank, pay, and emoluments—the number not to exceed one to each military post.

The recommendation of the Commissary General for the appointment of thirty-two assistant commissaries is approved. It is absolutely necessary that there should be, and there is, an officer acting as commissary at every post garrisoned by troops. The only bonded officers to act in such capacity are the officers of the subsistence department and the regimental quartermasters. The same bond should be required from assistant commissaries as is required to be given by the latter. The additional pay would only be allowed when the duty of assistant commissary was performed, and they would never perform that duty at a post of less than a full regiment when there was present either a commissary or a regimental quartermaster.

I would recommend that no appropriation be made to execute the requirements of section twenty-five of the act of Congress entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," and that public resolution of Congress No. 33, approved March 30, 1867, as promulgated in the following orders, be continued in force:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, April 15, 1867.

The following resolution of Congress is published for the information and government of all concerned:

[PUBLIC RESOLUTION, No. 33.]

A resolution to authorize the Commanding General of the Army to permit traders to remain at certain military posts.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the Commanding General of the Army shall be authorized to permit a trading establishment to be maintained, after the 1st day of July, 1867, at any military post on the frontier not in the vicinity of any city or town, and situated at any point between the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich and the eastern boundary of the State of California, when, in his judgment, such establishment is needed for the accommodation of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens: Provided, That after the commissary department shall be prepared to supply stores to soldiers as required by law no trader permitted to remain at such post shall sell any goods kept by the commissary department to any enlisted men: And provided further, That such traders shall be under protection and military control as camp followers.

Approved March 30, 1867.

Report of the Secretary of War.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

The Commissary General of Subsistence having reported that no special appropriation has been made by Congress to enable the subsistence department to carry into effect section twenty-five of the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866, which abolishes the office of sutler and requires said department to furnish for sale to officers and soldiers such articles (heretofore supplied by sutlers) as may be designated by the inspectors general of the Army; and in view of the large expenditure of funds necessary to furnish such supplies, and the delay which must ensue before an appropriation can be made for this purpose, it is ordered, that the sutlers at military posts on the frontier, not in the vicinity of any city or town, and situated between the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich and the eastern boundary of the State of California, shall, after the 1st of July, 1867, be retained, until further orders, as traders at such military posts, under the resolution of Congress approved March 30, 1867, authorizing the Commanding General of the Army to permit traders to remain at certain military posts.

Should the commanding officer of any post included in this order consider the present sutler of his post an unfit person to hold the office of trader, he will forward a report to that effect through intermediate commanders to those headquarters.

Assistant Adjutant General.

Traders at Military Posts.

General Orders, No. 58, of May 24, 1867, is modified so as to permit any persons, without limit as to number, to trade at the military posts situated between the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich and the eastern boundary of the State of California, subject only to such regulations and restrictions as may be imposed by department commanders.

By command of General Grant:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

SURGEON GENERAL.

From the report of the Surgeon General it will be found that since October 20, 1866, three surgeons, six assistant surgeons, and seven acting assistant surgeons have died. Of these five died of yellow fever and three of Asiatic cholera.

In the month of June of the present year Asiatic cholera appeared among the troops at various points in the West and Northwest; and for a time fears of a wide-spread epidemic were entertained. Recent reports from the infected command show that the disease has subsided, or has been eradicated by vigorous hygienic measures.

The valuable medical and mortuary records of this department were transferred to the fire-proof building on Tenth street in December, 1866. During the year official evidence has been furnished from these records of the death or discharge for disability in 55,600 cases.

Four thousand and eight monthly reports of sick and wounded, 315 special reports, 598 folio records of hospital records, 2,365 burial records, and 1,262 hospital muster and pay-rolls have been received during the year. The alphabetical registers of the dead, as far as completed, contain the names of 244,747 white soldiers, 29,796 colored soldiers, and 30,204 rebel soldiers.

In the division of surgical records the histories of 45,551 wounded men have been traced out and entered upon the permanent registers. The number thus entered now amounts to 207,941. The histories of the graver injuries and of those cases in which important operations were performed are very fully recorded.

Fifty-nine thousand five hundred and nineteen cases of wounds and operations occurring previous to the present system of registration and return of injuries have been compiled, and will be entered upon the permanent registers.

The average annual strength of white troops is represented by the reports at 41,104. The number taken on sick report for diseases, wounds, and injuries, 122,181, an average of nearly three entries on sick report for each man. The mortality during the year was 1,527. The average annual strength of the colored troops, as shown by the reports, is 6,561. The number taken on sick report for disease, wounds, and injuries was 19,694, an average of three entries on sick report for each man. The total number of white and colored soldiers discharged during the year on surgeons' certificate of disability is 618.

The Army Medical Museum was removed to the building on Tenth street in April last. Eight thousand five hundred and forty-two specimens have been catalogued, and a small appropriation will be required to continue and preserve this invaluable collection.

In September, 1867, a medical board was convened in New York city for the examination of candidates for the position of assistant surgeons in the Army and the promotion of assistant surgeons, which resulted in the appointment of forty-seven as assistant surgeons in the Army, and the promotion of fourteen assistant surgeons.

Of artificial legs, arms, &c., there were issued during the past year to wounded soldiers 573 pieces.

PAYMASTER GENERAL.

The Paymaster General reports that at the date of the last annual report there were 25 paymasters of the old establishment and 58 additional paymasters, making a total of 83. There have since been 35 appointed in the permanent establishment, the complement authorized by the "act to increase and fix the military peace establishment," approved July 28, 1866, making of regular paymasters created and now in service 60; reduction of additional paymasters during the fiscal year 37, leaving still in service 21. Total of both classes now in service 81.

The explanation given in the last annual report of the necessity of continuing in service some of the additional paymasters still exists in all its force, though it is expected that a further reduction may be practicable before the end of the current year.

The financial summary exhibits a balance on hand at the beginning of the fiscal year of.....$23,941,899 82
Received from Treasury and other sources during the year..... 34,933,958 27

Total.....$58,875,858 09

In hands of paymasters.....	4,321,788 39

Total.....$58,875,858 09

The total disbursements of each class during the fiscal year is as follows:

To troops in service.....	$20,078,855 09
To troops on muster-out.....	3,300,000 00
To Treasury certificates.....	10,614,000 00
To referred claims.....	8,765,602 00

Total.....$42,758,457 09

There have been received and recorded to October 20, 1867, 407,857 bounty claims under the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866. Of this number, 105,378 have been fully settled and disposed of at an expenditure of $9,352,797; 302,479 claims remain on hand to be settled.

Thirty-one thousand claims for ordering bounty and arrears of pay have also been settled and disposed of within the year, at an expenditure of $3,353,203.

Under the joint resolutions of Congress, the one approved March 30, 1867, and the other July 19, 1867, $1,500,000 was appropriated for expenditure in the five military districts of the South. Of this amount there has been drawn from the Treasury $1,454,728 93, leaving a balance in the Treasury of $45,271 07, which balance is to the credit of the second military district.

CHIEF ENGINEER.

The corps of engineers consists of one hundred and seven officers and the battalion of engineer troops. Seventeen officers are on detached duty, serving on the staff of the General of the Army, on the staffs of the general officers commanding military divisions and departments, at the Military Academy, on the Light-House Board, and in the Interior Department. The remainder are engaged, under the orders of the Chief of Engineers, upon the permanent defenses of the country, the survey of the lakes, the improvement of rivers and harbors and the surveys relating thereto, upon explorations, in the command and instruction of the engineer troops, and in the charge of public buildings, grounds, and works in Washington.

The work of strengthening the permanent defenses of the country and of adapting them to receive more powerful armaments has been continued during the past fiscal year.

Experimental targets and other structures have been in the course of construction for the purpose of determining the further modifications which sea-coast defense must undergo in view of the great power of modern ordnance and the best and most economical manner of using iron as shields or scarps, or in other modes, for defense.

The estimates for the sea-coast defenses during the next fiscal year are for the construction of such interior and other portions of the works now in progress as are not affected by the improved means of naval warfare and of siege operations, or where the increased strength required can be secured by simple means, such as greater thickness of earth-covering, &c.

The headquarters of the engineer battalion, with three companies, have been established at

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Willett's Point, the chief depot of engineer supplies; a second depot has been fixed at Jefferson barracks, with one company; and a third, near San Francisco, with one company. A detachment from the engineer battalion is at the Military Academy to aid in giving instruction in practical engineering.

Some legislation for improving the discipline and instruction of the engineer troops is recommended by the Chief of Engineers, and appears to be required.

The operations of the corps relating to reconnaissances and surveys for military and commercial purposes, and to the improvement of rivers and harbors, have progressed during the fiscal year in a satisfactory manner.

The maps of the country from the Mississippi to the Pacific, prepared chiefly from the first-named surveys, are indispensable to the troops now occupying that region. The explorations and surveys in progress and those in contemplation will continue to supply such wants and to furnish besides information of great value to the country.

The surveys for river and harbor improvements supply the information essential for legislation as well as for the proper location and construction of the works. They should be continued, especially upon the western rivers, where changes in the channels and bars and other obstacles to navigation are constantly going on.

The survey of the lakes has made satisfactory progress in the waters of Lakes Superior and Michigan, to which attention has been confined for the most part, to meet the demands of commerce now being developed upon the borders of those waters.

The report of the Chief of Engineers and accompanying papers contain all the information required to be presented by the acts of 1866 and 1867 making appropriations for certain river and harbor improvements and surveys. These works have been carried on in a highly satisfactory manner.

Embarrassments have been experienced in the execution of the acts, modifications of which are suggested by the Chief of Engineers.

A large number of detailed maps, intended to illustrate some of the principal campaigns and battle-fields, have been prepared, and others are in course of preparation. They contain information not only useful for the purposes intended, but highly valuable in connection with other objects, military and civil. The Chief of Engineers recommends an appropriation of $50,000 for the engraving and printing of the most important, a recommendation which is concurred in.

ORDNANCE BUREAU.

The expenditures of the Ordnance Bureau during the past fiscal year were less than one third of those of the preceding year. They were applied chiefly to work previously begun and partially executed, and to the settlement of war claims. The estimates for the next year are for defraying expenses of ordinary peace operations, and executing such works as have been authorized and directed by law.

The operations at the arsenals have been confined to the manufacture of iron gun-carriages and implements for sea-coast cannon and of articles required for issue to troops, the reception, care, and preservation of ordnance and ordnance stores, the breaking up of unserviceable ammunition, and the construction of authorized buildings and other permanent improvements. The hired men employed at the arsenals have been reduced from last year by about seventeen per cent., and the reduction is in further progress. There were, at the end of the year, 987 enlisted ordnance men employed at the arsenals in guard, police, and other military duties, and as mechanics and laborers in the workshops, magazines, and laboratories.

A title to the property on Rock island, Illinois, having been acquired, the construction of the arsenal and armory at that place, in accordance with the act of April 19, 1864, has been carried forward rapidly. The estimate for continuing that work during the next fiscal year is in accordance with its character and design as authorized and directed by law. The conditions connected with the appropriation in March last for the erection of a bridge at Rock Island having not yet been fulfilled by the railroad company, no part of that appropriation has been expended. From correspondence and negotiations with the railroad company in reference to the guarantee required from them by the appropriation act, it is understood that the company will agree to pay, and will satisfactorily guaranty the payment of half the cost of building the bridges across the main channel of the Mississippi river and across the slough on the Illinois side, and is anxious to have the bridges built as soon as practicable upon those conditions. As there is some doubt whether the guarantee which the company is willing to give would fulfill the exact requirements of the law, this subject is recommended to be brought to the notice of Congress for such further legislation as may be deemed necessary and proper. It is very desirable that the bridges should be built as soon as practicable, and that a sufficient appropriation for the purpose be made. When the work is done one half of its expense will be returned to the Government by the railroad company.

The arms and other ordnance stores which had accumulated at the southern arsenals, excepting one in Florida turned over for use by the Freedmen's Bureau, and one at Little Rock, Arkansas, occupied as a military station, have been repossessed, and are now in charge of the ordnance department. The buildings and other public property at these arsenals should be kept from decay and in proper preservation, and the ordnance estimates include the amount necessary for that purpose. The arsenal at Augusta, Georgia, from its position and healthfulness, is peculiarly suitable for a large arsenal of deposit, and its advantages in this respect should be made available as soon as it may be considered necessary and proper to store arms in the South. The establishment of an arsenal at a suitable point between the Missouri and the Rocky mountains, for supplying troops serving in that region, is considered necessary, and an appropriation for that purpose is recommended. The sale of the small arsenals at Rome, New York, Vergennes, Vermont, and Liberty, Missouri, which may be soon abandoned without disadvantage to the public service, is also recommended, as well as the sale of the North Carolina arsenal, the Macon armory, and the powder-works at Augusta, Georgia, which were captured from the rebel government. The land and other property at Harper's Ferry, formerly used for an armory, are not now required by the department, and their sale is recommended, if it be decided that it can be done under the Government title. If not sold, it is suggested that it be leased for a term of years.

There were 23,033 Springfield rifle muskets converted into breech-loaders during the past fiscal year at the national armory, and about 100,000 muskets, carbines, and sabers were cleaned and repaired there. All of the converted arms have been issued to troops, and nearly all the infantry serving in the departments of the Missouri and the Platte have been armed with them. Monthly reports received from the commanders of the companies so armed have been highly favorable to the arm, and furnish abundant evidence of its excellence and fitness for the military service. The almost unanimous opinion expressed by the officers is that the musket is simple, strong, not liable to get out of order, and extremely accurate in firing. Not a single officer has expressed the opinion that the caliber (reduced from that of the muzzle-loader) is too small, while a few have recommended a further reduction. These arms have done excellent service in an Indian campaign during the past summer. Very few of them have been reported as rendered unserviceable, and of these more were made unserviceable through carelessness than from all other causes. In July, 1866, the Secretary of War directed the conversion of 25,000 Springfield rifle muskets into breech-loaders, and the preparation of an adequate supply of proper ammunition. He afterward ordered the conversion of these arms to be continued, without fixing a limit as to number, and the work was carried on rapidly until August, 1867, when it was directed to be suspended, after 50,000 arms had been altered. That number is nearly completed, and there have been prepared the requisite tools for converting about 400 muskets per day, at which rate their conversion can be resumed at short notice. It is confidently believed that no converted breech-loader, in this country or in Europe, has been produced which is superior to the converted Springfield musket, as altered at the armory, and that none equal to it in serviceable qualities can be produced at less cost. In view of the fact that the 50,000 converted muskets will very soon be issued to troops, leaving no breech-loading muskets on hand in store, it is recommended that the conversion of the Springfield musket be resumed. The chief difficulties which have been interposed against the production of a good breech-loading musket by the ordnance department have been the immediate claim of almost every improvement under some of the many patents which have been granted for improvements in fire-arms, and the extreme eagerness and strong efforts of some inventors, and others interested in patents, to have their particular inventions used in the Government military service. There are many claims of patent rights in the methods used to convert the Springfield muskets. Several parties, in some instances, claim to hold patents for the same thing; and every improvement, it is believed, is claimed by more than one inventor. The validity of such patent claims for the improvements used at the national armory in converting the musket have not been acknowledged by the Ordnance Bureau, which believes that the proper course for the various claimants to take is to establish their respective rights, and then apply to Congress for remuneration for their use by the Government.

The cartridges used for breech-loading arms are known as "central fire," about 7,000,000 of which have been fabricated. Extensive trials of them, made by troops and in proofs, resulted in an average failure of only one third of one per cent.

Smooth-bore cannon of less than eight inches caliber being ineffective against iron-clad war vessels it has been determined to supersede all such now in the sea-coast forts by those of heavier caliber, and by rifled cannon. A board of engineer, ordnance, and artillery officers, specially appointed to consider the subject of arming the permanent forts, reported that 1,915 pieces of the caliber of thirteen, fifteen, and twenty inches for smooth-bores, and ten and twelve inches for rifles, were required for the permanent fortifications, and should be provided; and their report was approved by the Secretary of War. None of these guns have yet been provided, and there are no existing orders or contracts for heavy cannon. This stoppage of the procurement of heavy cannon has been mainly occasioned by "persistent efforts for some time past by ignorant or designing persons to destroy public confidence in the heavy guns which have been provided by the ordnance department of the Army and Navy." This subject, as also the experiments which have been made to test the durability and efficiency of these cannon are stated more fully and in detail in the report of the Chief of Ordnance. The experiments have resulted in establishing the fact that our heavy cast-iron cannon are the cheapest and most effective guns that are possessed by any nation. While this is fully proved so far as regards the smooth-bore heavy guns, and the same results have followed in respect to the rifles, so far as the tests have yet been applied to them, it is not deemed prudent to enter upon the manufacture of these latter to a large extent without the previous trial of a greater number of these guns.

Since the delivery of the report of the Chief of Ordnance that officer has received such information as to materially change his views in regard to additional legislation which he thinks necessary to secure the interests of the United States before expending any money on the railroad bridge at Rock Island.

His views will be submitted in special report hereafter.

SIGNAL CORPS.

The chief signal officer of the Army reports that the course of tuition in military signaling and telegraphing has been definitely established and commenced at West Point; that the preliminary steps have been taken to secure the arrangement, upon similar plans, in so far as is practicable, of the studies of these duties at the Military and Naval Academies; that a project for the general communication of the Army and Navy by signals common to both services has been brought under consideration; that a general order publishing regulations for the equipment and instruction of the Army has been authorized. When these plans shall have been carried into effect the active forces of the United States will be prepared to use, in the contingencies of the service, either aerial or electric telegraphy.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

The corps of cadets at the examination in June last numbered two hundred and fifty-five. Of these sixty-three graduated, and were commissioned in the Army.

The report of the Board of Visitors exhibits fully the excellent condition of the institution, and bears ample testimony of its usefulness. They renew the recommendation made by the board of the previous year to increase the number of cadets, giving substantially, but perhaps more elaborately, the same arguments for the increase. They also recommend that the pay and emoluments of the superintendent should be not less than those of a brigadier general, and give various strong reasons therefor. They rightly say that "the continuous and increasing visits of official persons from abroad and from our own country exact expenditures which ought not to be permitted by a generous people any longer to diminish his income." The erection of a fire-proof building for the preservation and safety of the records and archives of the Academy is also recommended. Congress appropriated $15,000 to accomplish this object, but it is found inadequate, and an additional appropriation of $15,000 is asked for this year. Other recommendations are made by the board, but for which no estimates are submitted by the inspector. The inspector bears liberal testimony to the unusual degree of interest and patience manifested by the board to examine and investigate all the affairs, faults, and errors of administration of the institution; and he says that it will be the pleasure and endeavor of the academic authorities to profit by and carry out the views and suggestions of the board where no legal obstacle intervenes.

The total estimate of military appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869 is: $77,124,707 03
For office of the General of the Army..... $5,000 00
For Adjutant General's office, recruiting service..... $300,000 00
For Inspector General's office—no appropriation.
For Military Academy..... $145,305 00
For pay of cadets, &c..... 188,707 00
$335,012 00

For Bureau of Military Justice no appropriation.
For Quartermaster General's department..... $28,180,066 20
For ditto—deficiency estimate..... 13,500,000 00
For ditto—for contingencies..... 100,000 00
$41,780,066 20

For subsistence department—no appropriation.
For medical department..... $15,000 00
For pay department..... $22,412,068 00
For Engineer Bureau..... $10,528,769 88
For Ordnance Bureau..... $1,533,084 00
For Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands—no appropriation.
For signal service..... $27,000 00

The foregoing estimates for the approaching fiscal year are taken from the estimate of the different bureau chiefs without change of the items. They are based upon the expenditures of the current year, and will probably exceed the amount which will be required. A season of peace with the Indians on the plains will of itself materially diminish the expenditures of the Army, and justify a reduction in the number of enlisted men in a company.

Attention may be attracted to the great increase of appropriation for the bureaus of the War Department asked for this year over the estimates of last year, and requires explanation. The expenses for the next fiscal year will necessarily be much below those for the present year. It will be observed that $13,600,000 of the present estimate is to cover deficiency in appropriation of last year. The last Congress made large appropriations for river and harbor improvements, for which no estimates were then made. The work having been commenced under such authority, it is now necessary to make large estimates for its continuance. The appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, having been made during the existence of war, were very large; far in excess of requirements after cessation of hostilities. This left a large balance, already appropriated, to commence the present fiscal year with, and reduced the estimate. No such balance will exist to commence the year 1868–69 with.

The small regular Army sustained by the United States prior to 1861 was kept well supplied with officers educated at the national Military Academy. After the rebellion, however, it was found necessary to increase this standing force about fourfold. The war educated soldiers to fill well, by judicious selections, this increase to the Army, but not to keep up the supply. The original vacancies created by this increase in the Army are now filled, and appointments hereafter to fill vacancies must go in at the foot of the Army Register. For this reason the time has passed, or soon will, when efficient volunteer soldiers, educated in the rebellion, will be willing to accept such positions, or, if willing, will be of an age making it unadvisable to accept them. While the Army has been so much increased, no addition has been made to the number of cadets admitted at West Point. I would now respectfully recommend an increase to the full number that can be accommodated without additional buildings. The present number of cadets is limited by the number of Representatives and Delegates in the lower House of Congress, and ten at large each year appointed by the President. Four hundred cadets can be accommodated without increase of expense to the Government further than the pay to the additional number. The manner of making these appointments, I would suggest, should be by adding three at large additional, to be appointed by the President, and by regarding a vacancy as existing in each congressional district when the cadet representing it enters the second class.

I would recommend the continuance for another year of the additional pay allowed to officers of the Army by the last Congress.

The thirty-seventh section of the act of July 23, 1866, appropriates $20,000 for the procurement of an equestrian statue of Lieutenant General Winfield Scott. It has been found that the work cannot be contracted for for less than from three to four times the appropriation; hence no contract has been entered into.

Special report will be submitted hereafter of plans and estimates that have been prepared for the erection of the new War Department buildings.

By act of Congress the ten southern States which have no representation in the national councils are divided into five military districts, each commanded by an officer of the Army of not less rank than brigadier general. The powers of these commanders are both civil and military. So far as their military duties are concerned they are under the same subordination to the General of the Army and Secretary of War that department commanders are. In their civil capacity they are entirely independent of both the General and Secretary, except in the matters of removals, appointments, and detail, where the General of the Army has the same powers as have district commanders. It is but fair to the district commanders, however, to state that, while they have been thus independent in their civil duties, there has not been one of them who would not yield to a positively expressed wish, in regard to any matter of civil administration, from either of the officers placed over them by the Constitution or acts of Congress, so long as that wish was in the direction of a proper execution of the law for the execution of which they alone are responsible. I am pleased to say that the commanders of the five military districts have executed their difficult trust faithfully and without bias from any judgment of their own as to the merit or demerit of the law they were executing.

THE FIRST MILITARY DISTRICT

comprises the State of Virginia, Brevet Major General J. M. Schofield commanding. In assuming command, the principle was announced by General Schofield that the military power conferred by act of Congress on the district commander would be used only so far as was necessary to accomplish the purposes for which the power was conferred. The civil government was interfered with only when necessary, and the wisdom of the policy has been demonstrated by the result. The instances of complaint of the action of the civil courts become exceedingly rare. Still the evil which existed prior to the act of Congress of March 2, 1867, though mitigated by the increased efficiency of civil officers, was not removed. It was an evil in the jury system, apparent at all times, and fully developed by the natural antagonism between loyalist and rebel, or the prejudice between white and black, existing throughout the South since the rebellion. The first idea was to admit blacks on juries and prescribe a test of loyalty. But as the requirement of a unanimous verdict must give very inadequate protection where strong prejudice of class or caste exists, and as a military change of jury system would be but temporary, it was determined to leave its change to the convention soon to meet, and be content with a system of military commissions. Such commissioners were appointed from officers of the Army and Freedmen's Bureau for the different cities and counties of the State, with powers of justices of the peace, while the State was divided into sub-districts under commanders whose powers were ultimately increased to those of circuit judges, taking jurisdiction only in cases where civil authorities failed to do justice. The system has given a large measure of protection to all classes of citizens, with slight interference with the civil courts.

Since the publication of the act of March 23, 1867, all elections have been suspended. Existing State, county, and municipal officers were continued in office. Vacancies have been filled by the district commander. The number of removals has been five, and of appointments to fill vacancies one hundred and five.

In executing the registration a board of officers was first appointed to select registering officers. The selections were made with great care, and the officers so selected have, with few exceptions, done their duty in the most satisfactory manner. Carefully prepared regulations for the boards of registration were issued, being made as specific as possible, so as to secure a uniform rule of disfranchisement throughout the State. In prescribing them the district commander was controlled by the belief that the law made him responsible for its correct interpretation as well as its faithful execution.

The results of the first session of the registering boards were all received on September 15. One hundred and fifteen thousand and sixty-eight whites and 101,382 colored were registered; 1,620 whites and 232 colored, being rejected. The tax list of 1866-67 (not quite complete) returns about 136,000 white male adults and 87,000 colored male adults. This indicates that the number of whites disfranchised, or who have failed to register, is about 19,000, and that about 15,000 more colored men have registered than were on the tax lists. Hence it may be inferred that nearly all male adults, white or colored, not disfranchised, have registered.

The principle upon which the apportionment was made was to give separate representations to the smallest practicable subdivisions of the State, and where fractions remained over to so combine counties in election districts as to justly represent those portions. This is believed to be the fairest mode of apportionment practicable under the law.

THE SECOND MILITARY DISTRICT comprises the States of North Carolina and South Carolina, Brevet Major General E. R. S. Canby commanding. Major General Daniel E. Sickles, who was originally assigned to the command of this district, was relieved, and General Canby assigned by the following order of the President:

[General Orders, No. 80.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, August 27, 1867.

I. The following orders have been received from the President:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., August 26, 1867.

Brevet Major General Edward R. S. Canby is hereby assigned to the command of the second military district, created by the act of Congress of March 2, 1867, and of the military department of the South, embracing the States of North Carolina and South Carolina. He will, as soon as practicable, relieve Major General Daniel E. Sickles, and, on assuming the command to which he is hereby assigned, will, when necessary to a faithful execution of the laws, exercise any and all powers conferred by acts of Congress upon district commanders, and any and all authority pertaining to officers in command of military departments.

Major General Daniel E. Sickles is hereby relieved from the command of the second military district.

The Secretary of War ad interim will give the necessary instructions to carry this order into effect.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

II. In pursuance of the foregoing order of the President of the United States, Brevet Major General Canby will, on the receipt of the order, turn over his present command to the next officer in rank to himself, and proceed to Charleston, South Carolina, to relieve Major General Sickles of the command of the second military district.

III. Major General Sickles, on being relieved, will repair to New York city, and report by letter to the Adjutant General.

By command of General Grant:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

"In order to secure a more efficient administration of justice it was deemed necessary to place all sheriffs and other municipal officers under the immediate control of a military officer. Accordingly all such officers were directed to report to the Provost Marshal General, and to make monthly reports of 'crimes committed' and 'prisoners confined.' The reports of prisoners confined have aided materially in detecting illegal imprisonments or punishments, and has enabled the district commander to secure the release of many Union men and freedmen, against whom much gross injustice had been committed.

"A bureau of civil affairs was established to take charge of all matters pertaining to registration, and its duties were afterward extended to include all questions of protection to person or property arising under the laws of Congress. One hundred and seventy registration precincts were established in North Carolina, and one hundred and nine in South Carolina.

"In North Carolina there were registered

103,060 whites and 71,657 blacks; and in South Carolina 45,751 whites and 79,585 blacks. Registration proceeded very slowly on account of slowness of communication with distant parts of the district.

"Of the appropriation made by Congress, $54,802 87 have been expended, and outstanding liabilities will exceed the balance on hand, $194,802 87.

"The present condition of the district is so satisfactory as to warrant the belief that after elections the number of military posts in both States can be diminished."

THE THIRD MILITARY DISTRICT comprises the States of Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, Brevet Major General John Pope commanding.

"On assuming command an order was issued" by General Pope "continuing in office State officials, but forbidding their opposing the reconstruction acts; prohibiting elections except under those acts, and giving notice that all vacancies in civil offices would be filled by the district commander. Becoming satisfied subsequently that State officials, while obeying the order personally, yet officially, by their patronage, encouraged papers opposing the reconstruction act, an order was issued forbidding official patronage to such papers.

"In consequence of the riot at Mobile an order was issued holding city and county officers responsible for the preservation of peace at all public meetings, and requiring the United States troops to assist them when called on. No disturbances have since occurred.

"Under the laws of the State no colored person could be admitted to the jury box, and there was no surety of justice to Union men, to people from the North, (and especially ex-Union soldiers,) or to colored persons, from juries inflamed with hostility toward such classes.

"There is a very large number of cases of wrong perpetrated by such juries in the district on file.

"Accordingly an order was issued directing all juries to be drawn indiscriminately from the list of voters registered by the boards of registration.

"Very few civil officers have been removed, and those in almost every case were removed for refusing to comply with orders. Appointments to fill vacancies have only been made where the daily business of the people demanded it.

"The State treasurers of Georgia, Alabama, and Florida have been ordered to make no payments after the appropriations of the present fiscal year have expired, save on warrants approved by the district commander, as it is believed that a new Legislature will not continue or approve many of the appropriations made.

"In executing the registration it was deemed advisable that no officer nor soldier of the United States should be employed, and accordingly each board of registration was appointed from among the citizens living in the district, and to consist of two white men and one colored. A fixed sum was paid for registering each name, the average for the district being twenty-six cents per name.

"There were registered in Georgia 95,214 whites and 93,457 colored; in Alabama 74,450 whites and 90,350 colored; and in Florida 11,180 whites and 15,357 colored. The amount expended in registration, &c., has been $162,325.

"The appointment of delegates was made in Georgia for State senatorial districts, and in Alabama for representative districts, fixed by an order. Polls were ordered to be opened at each county seat."

THE FOURTH MILITARY DISTRICT

comprises the States of Mississippi and Arkansas, Brevet Major General E. O. C. Ord commanding.

"The reconstruction measures of Congress are unpopular with a majority of the white people, but their execution has met with slight opposition, the ignorant and lawless, from whom alone trouble was to be apprehended, having been kept in order by the troops distributed through the States.

"The civil laws have not been interfered with when equally administered, except to remove from the civil courts cases of crime charged against persons who, being opposed to the rebellion, had reason to fear prejudice. Also freedmen's cases, where the courts were practically closed against them; and cases of horse-stealing, and violations of acts of Congress, for all of which military commissions have been organized.

"The officers of the provisional State governments have continued in office, except where they have failed to perform their duties. It is difficult to find competent men who can qualify to fill vacancies in civil offices, some of which are consequently vacant.

"In consequence of the indisposition (as manifested of late) of the civil authorities in Arkansas to take action in offenses of an aggravated nature against freedmen, orders have been issued for the trial of all such cases by military commission, and for prompt action to be taken for the punishment of civil officers who fail to issue writs against offenders committing assaults, &c., against freedmen, and prohibiting bail for the appearance of such criminals."

The extension of suffrage to freedmen has evidently aroused a sentiment of hostility to the colored race and to northern men in many parts of the district, which did not exist before; and General Ord is convinced that a larger force than is now stationed in those States to preserve order and organize conventions will be required hereafter to protect them and secure the freedmen the use of the suffrage.

"In a majority of the counties of this district there are very few men who can take the test oath, and these are not disposed to defy public opinion by accepting office, unless supported by a military force afterward.

"The will of the colored people may be in favor of supporting loyal office-holders, but their intelligence is not now sufficient to enable them to combine for the execution of their will. All their combinations are now conducted by white men, under the protection of the military; if the protection is withdrawn the white men now controlling would withdraw with it; and some of the southern people, now exasperated at what they deem the freedmen's presumption, would not be very gentle toward them, so that the presence of a larger military force will be required for some time to maintain the freedmen in the right of suffrage."

THE FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT

comprises the States of Louisiana and Texas, Brevet Major General J. A. Mower commanding.

No report has yet been received from General Mower, but it is expected in time for the meeting of Congress.

Major General P. H. Sheridan, who was originally assigned to the command of this district, was relieved, and General Hancock assigned, by the following orders of the President. On the decease of Brevet Major General Charles Griffin, designated as the officer next in rank to whom General Sheridan should turn over the command until General Hancock assumed it, General Mower succeeded to the command:

[General Orders, No. 77.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, August 17, 1867.

I. The following orders have been received from the President:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., August 17, 1867.

Major General George H. Thomas is hereby assigned to the command of the fifth military district, created by the act of Congress passed on the 2d day of March, 1867.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Major General P. H. Sheridan is hereby assigned to the command of the department of the Missouri. Major General Winfield S. Hancock is hereby assigned to the command of the department of the Cumberland.

The Secretary of War ad interim will give the necessary instructions to carry this order into effect.
ANDREW JOHNSON.

II. In pursuance of the foregoing order of the President of the United States, Major General G. H. Thomas will, on the receipt of the order, turn over his present command to the officer next in rank to himself, and proceed to New Orleans, Louisiana, to relieve Major General P. H. Sheridan of the command of the fifth military district.

III. Major General P. H. Sheridan, on being relieved from the command of the fifth military district by Major General G. H. Thomas, will proceed to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, and will relieve Major General W. S. Hancock in the command of the department of the Missouri.

IV. Major General W. S. Hancock, on being relieved from the command of the department of the Missouri by Major General Sheridan, will proceed to Louisville, Kentucky, and will assume command of the department of the Cumberland.

V. Major General G. H. Thomas will continue to execute all orders he may find in force in the fifth military district at the time of his assuming command of it, unless authorized by the General of the Army to annul, alter, or modify them.

VI. Major General Sheridan, before relieving Major General Hancock, will report in person to these headquarters.

By command of General Grant:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

[General Orders, No. 81.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, August 27, 1867.

I. The following orders have been received from the President:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 26, 1867.

SIR: In consequence of the unfavorable condition of the health of Major General George H. Thomas, as reported to you in Surgeon Haddon's dispatch of the 21st instant, my order dated August 17, 1867, is hereby modified so as to assign Major General Winfield S. Hancock to the command of the fifth military district, created by the act of Congress passed March 2, 1867, and of the military department comprising the States of Louisiana and Texas. On being relieved from the command of the department of the Missouri by Major General P. H. Sheridan, Major General Hancock will proceed directly to New Orleans, Louisiana, and, assuming the command to which he is hereby assigned, will, when necessary to a faithful execution of the laws, exercise any and all powers conferred by acts of Congress upon district commanders, and any and all authority pertaining to officers in command of military departments.

Major General P. H. Sheridan will at once turn over his present command to the officer next in rank to himself, and proceeding, without delay, to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, will relieve Major General Hancock of the command of the department of the Missouri.

Major General George H. Thomas will, until further orders, remain in command of the department of the Cumberland.

Very respectfully, yours,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

General U. S. GRANT,

Secretary of War ad interim.

II. In compliance with the foregoing instructions of the President of the United States, Major General P. H. Sheridan will, on receipt of this order, turn over his present command to Brevet Major General Charles Griffin, the officer next in rank to himself, and proceed, without delay, to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, and will relieve Major General Hancock in command of the department of the Missouri.

III. On being relieved by Major General Sheridan, Major General Hancock will proceed, without delay, to New Orleans, Louisiana, and assume command of the fifth military district, and of the department composed of the States of Louisiana and Texas.

IV. Major General George H. Thomas will continue in command of the department of the Cumberland.

By command of General Grant:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Generals Sheridan and Sickles having been relieved before the period for submitting their annual reports; none have been received from them. They have, however, been called on recently to submit reports, which may be expected before the meeting of Congress.

The territory of the United States not embraced in the five military districts is divided into military divisions (they subdivided into departments) and departments.

ABSTRACT OF REPORTS FROM MILITARY DIVISIONS AND DEPARTMENT COMMANDERS.

The Military Division of the Missouri, commanded by Lieutenant General W. T.

Sherman, embraces the departments of Dakota, the Platte, and the Missouri; commanded respectively by Brevet Major General A. H. Terry, Brevet Major General C. C. Angur, and Major General P. H. Sheridan.

During the latter part of the year 1866, the operations of this command were embarrassed by the necessity of mustering out the volunteer troops that had been organized for the war of the rebellion, before a sufficient number of regular troops could be raised and forwarded to remote parts of the frontier, to replace them. The winter of 1866-67 proved to be unprecendently severe, so that it was a physical impossibility to keep open communication with some of the most remote posts. The garrison of Fort Phil. Kearney, on Powder river, two hundred and twenty-three miles distant from old Fort Laramie, suffered severely from an attack made by Indians, December 21, 1866, upon a wagon-train and its escorts, that had been sent a short distance from the fort to procure lumber, in which Brevet Lieutenant Colonel W. J. Fetterman and a detachment of forty-nine men were killed. In December other bands of hostile Indians made their appearance at Fort Buford, and rumors were received of the massacre of the entire garrison. All communication being cut off by the severity of the weather, great anxiety was felt for the safety of the garrison for two months, when reports were received contradicting the capture of the post.

In the spring of 1867 rumors were received from all quarters of a renewal of Indian hostilities. Though many proved to be greatly exaggerated, yet depredations and attacks on the principal emigrant routes increased to such an extent that it required the utmost activity on the part of the troops to keep open communication with our Territories and protect working parties on the important railroads now in process of construction.

A village of the Cheyennes and Sioux, on Pawnee fork, was burned April 19, as a punishment for depredations previously committed.

Department commanders visited the scenes of hostilities in person, and made every effort with the means at hand to afford protection. They have at times been greatly embarrassed by a disposition on the part of irresponsible persons to precipitate hostilities by false rumors and sensation reports.

Since the Indian commission provided by act of July 20, 1867, commenced its labors the operations of the troops have been confined to the defensive, and they are now principally engaged in garrisoning the most important posts.

Indians have been employed as soldiers under the provisions of the act of July 28, 1866, with some success. The attention of Congress is respectfully invited to the remarks of Lieutenant General Sherman on this subject, and also in regard to providing for a more efficient civil government in the Indian country.

The following number of trains have passed Fort Sedgwick, Colorado Territory, from February 1 to September 28: Trains, 124; wagons, 3,074; men, 4,587; women, 556; children, 587; mules, 5,738; oxen, 11,096; horses, 1,062; led animals, 948.

The Department of the Cumberland,

Major General G. H. Thomas commanding, embraces the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and West Virginia.

General Thomas reports that with his present force he is able, partially, to hold in check the disloyal tendencies of the people, and to punish, if not prevent, unlawful proceedings; that, although there still remains much to be desired in the way of protection to life and property throughout his command outrages are not so prevalent as formerly, but the feeling of the people is still hostile to the Government.

A small force is retained in West Virginia, as it is believed that without it the laws would not be impartially executed.

In anticipation of trouble in Tennessee at the period of the August elections, the troops were so disposed as to be able to render proper assistance to the civil authorities in suppressing riots or violence of any kind. The department commander was directed to proceed in person to Memphis, and to make the best disposition to guard against an outbreak. The election, however, passed off quietly, and the services of the troops were not required. Trouble was again apprehended at Nashville at the charter election in September, and General Thomas was directed to go in person to that city, and take every precaution against a disturbance, with the usual instructions to employ the troops only to preserve peace, not permit them to take sides in political differences, and to prevent mobs from aiding any party. General Thomas, by his presence and advice, again rendered the interposition of troops unnecessary.

The Department of the Lakes,

Brevet Major General J. C. Robinson commanding, embraces the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin.

The few troops stationed in this department have been employed in garrisoning the forts on our northern frontier.

The Department of Washington,

Brevet Major General W. H. Emory commanding. A disturbance being apprehended in Baltimore upon the occasion of the threatened removal of the police commissioners by the Governor of Maryland the headquarters of this department were temporarily transferred to that city November 6, 1866, and the troops were held in readiness to preserve the peace in case it should become necessary to employ them. Their services, however, were not required.

The Military Division of the Pacific,

Major General H. W. Halleck commanding, embraces the department of the Columbia and the department of California, commanded respectively by Brevet Major General F. Steele and Brevet Major General Irvin McDowell. The territory, including the district of Alaska or Russian America, contains 1,235,000 square miles, or more than one third of our entire territory, estimating it at 3,579,002 square miles. Coast line is estimated at 12,750 statute miles—more than three times the length of our Atlantic coast.

Number of tribal Indians is about 130,000, or more than one third the whole number in the United States, estimating this number at 330,000.

White population is about one sixtieth part of the entire civilized population of the United States.

Though some depredations have been committed upon white settlers in nearly every part of the military division, active military operations have been limited to Arizona, southern Idaho, southeastern Oregon, and the northern portions of Nevada and California. Most of the troops engaged in hostile operations in the latter district have been under command of Brevet Major General Crook, who has exhibited skill, bravery, and untiring energy.

Indians have no principal chiefs, but roam in small bands, and fight independently; hence the impossibility to make treaties with them. As their hunting grounds are gradually taken from them by the settlers they are obliged either to rob or starve. The Apaches are the most hostile Indians. They will observe no treaties, agreements, or truces. With them there is no alternative but active and vigorous war till they are completely destroyed or forced to surrender as prisoners of war.

Though, from various causes, operations against hostile tribes during the past year have not been as active and successful as was expected, considerable progress has been made in breaking up their haunts and punishing their depredations.

Services of Indian scouts employed under act of Congress have been of the greatest value in this military division. Officers are unanimously in favor of increasing the number. As guides and scouts they have been almost indispensable. At least a thousand could be employed on the Pacific coast.

Commanders have been embarrassed by the number of Indians in their hands taken as prisoners of war. They require troops to guard them, and have to be fed by the commissary. They cannot be set to work unless reservations of land and farming implements are provided. General Halleck recommends the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and the removal of the Indians to large reservations placed, entirely under military authority, and from which all white settlers should be excluded. He condemns the present Indian system, but does not cast reflections on the officers of the Indian Bureau in his military division. They have endeavored to do as much good as possible with their limited means.

The Department of the East,

Major General G. G. Meade commanding. This department embraces the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware. The troops have been employed in garrisoning the forts on our northern frontier and North Atlantic coast, and the operations have been confined to improving the posts and collecting and forwarding recruits to the Army.

Acting in the double capacity of Secretary of War and General of the Army this report is made to embrace both.

U. S. GRANT,

Secretary of War ad interim and General United States Army.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 2, 1867.

SIR: During the year our naval force has been almost exclusively employed on foreign stations. But little remained for it to perform in our own waters, and the general peace which has prevailed throughout the civilized world has called for no interposition or active operations on our part for the protection of our commerce abroad. The display of a naval force has been sufficient to suppress threatened difficulties, and in every quarter American interests have been respected and American rights observed by commercial nations, and intercourse and trade have been fostered.

EXHIBIT OF THE NAVAL FORCE.

During the year the aggregate naval force has been reduced to forty vessels and four hundred and eighty-two guns. The number of vessels in commission has been reduced twelve, and the number on squadron service is thirteen less than at the date of my last report. The following is a summary of the present condition of the vessels of the Navy:

	No.	Guns.
Vessels in squadron service.....	56	507
Apprentice ships.....	3	52
Receiving ships.....	8	129
Special and lake service.....	3	54
Attached to Naval Academy.....	10	115
On service at yards and stations, including yard and powder tugs, and vessels used as barracks and as coal barges.....	23	41
Total number of vessels in use.....	103	898
Iron-clad vessels laid up.....	49	109
Iron-clad vessels not completed.....	6	22
Steam vessels not completed.....	21	332
Sailing vessels not completed, (old line-of-battle ships).....	2	-
Older vessels laid up, repairing, fitting for sea, and for sale.....	57	508
Total number of vessels and guns.....	238	1,869

Eleven thousand nine hundred men have been employed in the naval and coast survey service during the year.

EUROPEAN SQUADRON.

Admiral Farragut was last spring designated to command the European squadron. He hoisted his flag on the Franklin at New York on the 17th of June, and departed from Sandy Hook on the 28th of that month. On the 14th of July he relieved Rear Admiral Goldsborough at Cherbourg.

The reception of our distinguished naval commander by the people at the different ports he has visited, and by the sovereigns and authorities of Europe, has been of a character gratifying to himself and to the Government and people of the United States. At Cherbourg the Franklin was visited by the empress of France, while Admiral Farragut was invited to Paris by the emperor, who tendered to him personal attention and courtesy.

On the 30th of July he sailed for Cronstadt; the Ticonderoga, Canandaigua, and Frolic composing, with his flag-ship, the squadron which went up the Baltic. This was the largest American naval force which had ever visited the countries of northern Europe. Highly complimentary and friendly honors, naval and civil, were everywhere extended. International, official, and honorary salutes were given and returned. At Cronstadt the squadron was visited by his highness the Grand Duke Constantine, the official head of the Russian navy, by Rear Admiral Lessofsky, and other dignitaries, and by the municipal authorities of St. Petersburg. During their brief stay at Cronstadt our officers experienced the unbounded hospitality and unwearied courtesy and attention of the Russian Government and people, whose friendship and attachment to the United States have been so often and unmistakably manifested. Many availed themselves of invitations to visit Moscow, the ancient capital, and other parts of the empire. Upon leaving Cronstadt, on the 30th of August, the squadron proceeded by invitation from the grand duke to visit and inspect the iron-clad fleet of Russia at Trongsund roads, where a grand naval review took place. On the 1st of September they proceeded to sea amid cheering from all the ships of the two squadrons, "concluding," in the words of Admiral Farragut, "a visit which from first to last has been marked by the interchange of the warmest friendliness, and which we shall always cherish as one of the most pleasant remembrances of our lives."

The squadron anchored on the 3d of September off Waxholm, below Stockholm. A vessel was placed at the disposal of Admiral Farragut during his stay, by order of the Government, and on reaching the Swedish capital he was presented to the king, who expressed the gratification which it gave him to welcome the vessels of war of the United States once more in the waters of Sweden.

The squadron left Stockholm on the 9th of September, and on the 14th anchored off Copenhagen. During the run to this point, and in a heavy gale, the full steaming power of the Franklin was tested. Her performance gave general satisfaction, and Admiral Farragut says that he "can with confidence say she steams better under full power than any frigate in our service." The ministers of war and marine tendered him all the civilities in their power during his stay in Copenhagen. On the 19th, by invitation, he dined with the king of Denmark, his brother, and his two sons, the crown prince, and his majesty George the king of Greece.

Admiral Farragut left Copenhagen on the 19th of September, and arrived off Gravesend, England, on the 26th. The lords commissioners of the admiralty here telegraphed him that they would be happy to render any attention to him and his squadron that might be agreeable. He accompanied them on their annual tour of inspection of the dock-yards of Woolwich, Chatham, Sheerness, and Portsmouth. Great courtesy was invariably extended to him and his officers on these visits. The Prince de Joinville visited the Franklin, and the Admiral and his officers accepted the cordial invitation of the prince to visit him at his residence at Mount Lebanon. The flag-ship having gone to Sheerness, the Admiral joined her at that place, on the 12th October. On the 14th he attended the gun target practice at Shoeburyness.

On the 15th, Admiral Farragut sailed for Portsmouth, which point he reached the next day. On the 17th he entertained the lords of the admiralty, receiving them with full honors, and on the day following made a most interesting visit to the dock-yard, the gunnery ship, and some of the iron-clads. On the 19th he received his highness the duke of Cambridge, with yards manned, the royal standard at the main, and a salute of twenty-one guns. During his entire stay at Portsmouth a small steamer was placed at his disposal, and the Admiral was received with every kindness and hospitality, not only by officers of the army and navy, but also by the civil authorities.

On the 20th he left Portsmouth, and on the next day anchored in Plymouth harbor. At this place there was a repetition of the civilities received at other points, extending over three days. The Admiral sailed on the 24th and anchored off Lisbon on the 28th.

The dispatches of Admiral Farragut relating to his public movements received at the Department prior to November 1 are given in the appendix to this report.

Rear Admiral Goldsborough continued in command of the squadron until relieved by Admiral Farragut. In the month of December, 1866, the Colorado left Lisbon for the Mediterranean, and after passing a few days at Port Mahon proceeded in January to Villefranche, where she remained until March, when she left for southern Italy. In May she went from Naples to Trieste, and returned by way of Carthage to Gibraltar in June.

In the month of November, 1866, on a joint application from Mr. King, our minister at Rome, and Mr. Fox, then one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Navy, who was in Rome, urging the immediate presence of one of our ships-of-war at Civita Vecchia on a very important matter, the Swatara was ordered to proceed to that place. The object in view was the transportation of John H. Surratt, charged with having been implicated in the assassination of the late President Lincoln, to the United States. But the prisoner escaped from his captors and fled from the Papal dominions. He was, however, retaken in Alexandria, whither the Swatara followed him, and where Commander Jeffers received him on the 21st of December, from our consul general in Egypt. Leaving Alexandria, the Swatara, after a tedious voyage, touching at Nice and Punal, reached Washington in February, where Commander Jeffers delivered the prisoner to the marshal of the District of Columbia, and the Swatara immediately thereafter returned to Lisbon, and rejoined the European squadron.

Earnest appeals in behalf of the suffering Christians in Crete have from time to time been made to our naval officers urging them to so far depart from the principle of non-interference and that neutrality which the Government of the United States has studiously enjoined and observed, as to repair to that island and convey to the shores of Greece the women and children, who were represented as houseless and destitute, the results of the insurrection against the Turkish authorities. Rear Admiral Goldsborough, to whom application was first made for a naval vessel to transport the inhabitants from Crete, very properly declined to violate neutral obligations, nor could the Department authorize him to employ a steamer to convey inhabitants from Turkish territory during civil war without the consent of the Turkish Government. He was informed that if our minister at Constantinople could obtain permission of the Government to convey away the inhabitants the Department would interpose no objection to the employment of a steamer as requested, though naval vessels are not adapted to transportation.

The Canandaigua, Captain Strong, was dispatched to Crete with full, explicit, and guarded instructions from Rear Admiral Goldsborough to first obtain an interview with the chief authority of the island, explain the object of his visit to be one of friendship, harmony, and humanity, and if consent could be obtained to receive on board as many Greek women and children as the vessel could accommodate and take them to Greece. In an interview with Omar Pacha, Captain Strong communicated his instruction; but permission was refused, and he was informed it would not be allowed under any circumstances.

Subsequently, on the 26th July, Admiral Farragut dispatched the Swatara, Commander Jefferies, to Crete. His reports confirm the representations of Captain Strong of the Canandaigua as to the impolicy of any interference on our part with either of the belligerents. It could not be done without violating the neutrality which we had always observed, and whatever may have been our sympathies we could take no active measures with the insurrectionists without an injustice to the Turkish Government, which had scrupulously respected our national integrity and refused recognition of the rebels when other nations gave them countenance. At a period when other Powers restricted the courtesies which belonged to us, placed us on the footing of belligerents and extended to the rebels all the privileges that were given to the naval vessels of the United States, the Turkish Government maintained honorable faith with us, and gave no encouragement to the insurrection which threatened the stability of our Union. The dispatches of Captain Strong and Commander Jefferies are appended to this report.

ASIATIC SQUADRON.

The Asiatic squadron is still under the command of Rear Admiral H. H. Bell, and has been reinforced during the year by the addition of the Oneida, Iroquois, Aroostook, Unadilla, and the Onward, and consists at this time of the

The Piscataqua, one of the steam frigates recently built, will sail in a few days to relieve the Hartford, and carry out Rear Admiral S. C. Rowan, who will succeed Rear Admiral Bell. The Idaho, taken into the service by direction of Congress, has been converted into a sailing vessel by removing the boilers and machinery, which were condemned as worthless. She sailed from New York November 1, and will be stationed at Nagasaki and be used principally as a hospital and store-ship.

The Maumee is now on her way to join the squadron, and the Wachusett, Wyoming, Onward, and Supply are under orders to return to the United States.

In April last, by request of Mr. Van Valkenburgh, the United States minister, Rear Admiral Bell proceeded to Yokohama, having been advised that the foreign ministers resident in Japan proposed to visit the Tycoon, who had invited them to an interview at his country residence. The occasion being an extraordinary one in the history of Japanese intercourse with foreigners, and the transaction one of an important commercial and business character, Rear Admiral Bell deemed it expedient that our minister should be sustained by the display of a respectable naval force off the port of Osaka, and that Mr. Van Valkenburgh should be conveyed hither in his flag-ship, the Hartford. With this intent he assembled at Yokohama the Hartford, Shenandoah, and Wyoming, of his squadron. Unfortunately the machinery of the Hartford became temporarily disabled on her passage from Hong Kong, and she could not therefore discharge this duty. The minister was, however, accommodated on board the Shenandoah, which, in company with the Wyoming, proceeded to Osaka, where he was landed on the 1st of May with the usual honors, and escorted by the marine guard of both vessels. Rear Admiral Bell subsequently arrived in the Hartford, and remained with the Shenandoah and Wyoming until the object of the mission was completed, when the Shenandoah returned with the minister to Yokohama, and the Hartford and Wyoming proceeded by way of the inland sea to Nagasaki.

The Japanese Government having, in the interview between the Tycoon and the ministers, signified its purpose to open an additional port on the western coast to foreign trade, our minister, in pursuance of an arrangement with his colleagues, left Yokohama on the 25th of June in the Shenandoah, which had been placed at his disposal, with a view of examining the different ports and selecting the most suitable one for commercial purposes. Unusual interest marked this cruise. The Shenandoah reached Hakodadi on the 28th of June, and the first salute that was ever fired there in honor of a foreign minister was given on this occasion. The minister and the officers of the Shenandoah were received by the governor with marked ceremony and politeness. On the 12th of July the Shenandoah entered the port of Neegata, where similar courtesies were extended to them by the governor, vice-governor, and a large concourse of officials. Nanou was reached on the 13th of July, no American vessel having ever before entered that harbor, and on the 17th of July she visited Mikuni and also Tsurunga, where no foreign vessel of war had ever previously anchored. The Shenandoah arrived on the 20th at Miyadsu, the most beautiful of all the bays visited.

Commodore Goldsborough and the officers under his command made surveys of most of these new harbors, and prepared sailing directions for their entrance.

In consequence of the domestic troubles in Japan, and to prevent interruption of our opening commerce with that country, and especially in consideration of the national importance of the recently established communication with Asia by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, one or more of the vessels of the Asiatic squadron is constantly maintained in the waters of Japan.

American commerce in the East suffered some detriment during our civil war, and others have profited by our misfortune. Prussia has, within a few years, become conspicuous as a mercantile Power in the east. Sailing vessels under her flag are seen in every port, receiving freights at lower rates than are offered by either American or British ships, and German merchants are securing a thriving business in that quarter. Apprehensions are expressed that we are not destined to recover the prestige of our former successful mercantile marine in the China seas unless it be by means of steam vessels built for that trade. The arrival of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's steamer Colorado, the first of that line, at Hong Kong in January last, via Yokohama, twenty-nine and a half days from San Francisco, was an event of vast importance in steam navigation, as well as of intense interest to our countrymen in eastern Asia, and was greeted by our naval vessels with a salute of twenty-one guns, and their mast-heads were dressed with the American ensign. The establishment of this line of steamers is, without doubt, destined to have an expanding and beneficent influence on the commerce of the world.

In the autumn of 1866 intelligence reached the squadron that the American schooner General Sherman had been wrecked in the Ping Yang river, one of the streams of Corea, and that all of her officers, crew, and passengers were murdered. Rear Admiral Bell dispatched the Wachusett, Commander E. W. Shufeldt, to Chifu to investigate the circumstances attending the loss of the General Sherman, with instructions to demand of the chief authorities that, if there were any survivors of the schooner, they should be delivered on the deck of the Wachusett, whatever might be their nationality, and to make such further investigation as was practicable.

The Wachusett anchored near the mouth of the Ta Tong river, on the west coast of Corea, on the 23d of January. The pilot secured for those waters did not consider it safe at that season to take the vessel to the Ping Yang, which was some fifty miles to the northward. Commander Shufeldt had, therefore, to communicate with the king of Corea by a messenger, secured through the instrumentality of the chief of a fishing village. The object of his visit and his demands were thus made known; but no reply to his communication was received. On the 29th of January, however, an officer, who claimed to be from the capital, was presented on board the Wachusett, and had an interview with her commander. The result was most unsatisfactory. Commander Shufeldt was unable to find any peaceable solution of the difficulty, or that there were any survivors of the ill-fated vessel.

In reference to this affair, Rear Admiral Bell apprehends that "until the Government takes efficient action on this case our countrymen lawfully navigating the seas adjacent to Corea will be in peril of life and liberty of person from the barbarities of the people and the authorities of that country, who aim at the exclusion of strangers."

No survey of that part of the coast has ever been made. Commander Shufeldt, therefore, while waiting a response to his communication to the king, improved the time in making a partial survey of the Ta Tong river.

Piracies have occurred less frequently the current year than in some former seasons. They do not often take place during the northeast monsoons, that is, between October and May. The violence of the winds at that season prevents the vessels from being becalmed and drives the piratical junks and row boats from the sea. It also carries American and European vessels off the coast or into ports with too great speed to be boarded. The season for piracies is during the southwest monsoons, when calms and summer breezes with smooth seas prevail.

The Monocacy was instructed to proceed in May last to Bruni, Borneo, and investigate, for the information of the Government, the circumstances of an alleged attack on, and the destruction of, the residence of the American consul at that place. On the 27th of that month, the Monocacy, Commander Carter, anchored abreast of the sultan's palace off Bruni, and after executing his mission left on the 1st of June.

In the early part of the year information reached the squadron that the American bark Rover had been wrecked on the southeast end of the island of Formosa, and it was rumored that all who were on board had been murdered. Commander Febiger, with the Ashuelot, was ordered to proceed to the locality in question, gain what information he could in reference to the affair, and rescue the survivors should any be found. On his arrival at Tai-wan-Foo, in April, Commander Febiger required of the three principal authorities of the island an immediate investigation of the outrage, the seizure and punishment of those implicated, and the recovery of any of the shipwrecked crew who survived. The authorities expressed much interest in the case, and indicated a desire to obtain all information possible, and to punish those who were engaged in it; but they claimed to be unable to bring to justice the perpetrators of the crime, who belonged to a horde of savages that were not obedient to their laws. They represented, moreover, that it was difficult to employ an effective armed force against savages who were incapable of holding negotiations with civilized people. On visiting the immediate scene of the outrage Commander Febiger deemed it inadvisable, with his limited force, to resort to hostile measures.

Rear Admiral Bell was not disposed that so great a crime should pass unpunished, and he therefore left Shanghai in June, with the Hartford and Wyoming, for the purpose of destroying, if possible, the lurking places of the savages who had murdered the crew of the Rover. When he reached Taka he received on board Mr. Pickering, an interpreter; Mr. Taylor, a merchant at that place, and her Britannic majesty's consul, Charles Carroll, Esq., who were anxious to accompany the expedition. The latter gentleman had previously humanely, but unsuccessfully, endeavored to communicate with the savages and ransom any of the crew of the Rover who survived.

On the 13th of June the vessels anchored within half a mile of the shore, and one hundred and eighty-one officers, sailors, and marines were landed, under command of Commander George C. Belknap, of the Hartford, accompanied by Lieutenant Commander Alexander S. Mackenzie, fleet lieutenant, as second in command, he having earnestly sought to go on the expedition.

Soon after landing, savages, dressed in cloths and their bodies painted, were, by the aid of glasses, seen assembled in parties of ten or twelve on the cleared hills about two miles distant, their muskets glittering in the sun. As our men approached the hills the savages, familiar with the paths, descended to meet them, and, gliding through the high grass from cover to cover, displayed a strategy and courage equal to North American Indians. Delivering their fire, they retreated without being seen by our men, who, charging on their coverts, frequently fell into ambuscades. The detachment pursued them in this harassing manner out of sight of the ships until two p. m., when they halted to rest. While thus resting the savages covertly approached and fired upon the party. Lieutenant Commander Mackenzie immediately placed himself at the head of the company commanded by Lieutenant Sands, of the Hartford, and daringly led a charge into the ambuscade. He fell mortally wounded by a musket-ball, and died while being borne to the rear. His loss was deeply felt by his comrades; and his commander, in communicating his death, pays a generous and deserved tribute to this gallant young officer when he says the Navy could boast no braver spirit and no man of higher promise. He was distinguished for his professional knowledge, aptitude, and tact, and for suavity of manners, which inspired the confidence and affection of his men, while his impetuous courage impelled him ever to seek the post of danger, where he was always seen in the advance, a conspicuous mark and an example.

Several of the officers and men experienced severe sunstrokes, the heat being intense; and as the command was generally exhausted in unavailing efforts to get at the enemy, Commander Belknap determined to return to the ships, which were reached at four p. m., after an exhausting march of six hours under a tropical sun.

The experience obtained demonstrated the inutility of such an expedition against a savage enemy in a wild country, by sailors unaccustomed to ambuscades and bush life. No troops could have exhibited more bravery, but the warfare was one to which sailors are not adapted. These considerations and the prostrated condition of his men decided Rear Admiral Bell to make no further attempt by again landing his force. They had already done all that was possible, by burning a number of native huts and in chasing the warriors through coverts of green jungle and green grass, which are represented as fire-proof at that season.

The Shenandoah on the way to the Asiatic squadron touched at Calcutta and remained several days. No American man-of-war having for some twenty-five years visited that port the appearance of the Shenandoah attracted unusual attention. She was warmly welcomed by our countrymen, and the military and civil authorities and inhabitants of the place.

She left Calcutta December 18, and, touching at Penang, arrived at Singapore the 21st. From Singapore she proceeded to Bangkok, in Siam, and the French settlement Saigon, in Cochin China. At Bangkok a friendly greeting was received from the king and his ministers.

On the way to her station the Iroquois touched at St. Augustine bay, Madagascar, and at Johanna, one of the Comoro islands in the Mozambique channel. At St. Augustine bay his majesty King Willy was entertained on board. He expressed his gratification at the arrival of the Iroquois, the first American man-of-war which had ever touched there. At Johanna visits were exchanged with the sultan, who was found well disposed to our flag. He complained of an indirect slave trade carried on by the French, and that some of our own merchantmen had at different times carried his subjects from the island without permission. Commander English left a circular addressed to commanders of merchantmen touching there requesting them not to ship or receive on board subjects of the sultan without permission. The Iroquois also touched at Aden, Muscat, and Bombay.

The Aroostook, which a short time previously had touched at Johanna, was the first American man-of-war that had been in that port for nine years. It being the 4th of July, the ship was dressed and the flag of the sultan hoisted at the fore, for which courtesy the thanks of the principal minister were sent on board, the sultan being temporarily absent on the other side of the island.

NORTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON.

The causes which rendered expedient the continuance of a distinct force in the Gulf of Mexico ceased when the attempt to establish an imperial Government in Mexico was abandoned. A consolidation of the squadron under Commodore Winslow with that of Rear Admiral Palmer was therefore determined upon in April, and in pursuance of instructions then issued the transfer was made on the 22d of May. This transfer disposed of the last of the several squadrons which our civil war had called into existence. It had been retained as a distinct force two years after all organized resistance to the Government had ceased, in consequence of the peculiar condition of affairs in the neighboring republic, and not from any disturbance within our own territory. From the date of the transfer Rear Admiral Palmer has had command of the whole North Atlantic squadron. In consequence of the prevalence of yellow fever a number of the vessels have been withdrawn. This disease has prevailed to a great extent the current year along the Gulf and through a considerable portion of the West Indies. At this time Rear Admiral Palmer has under his command the—

Although the operations and movements of the vessels of this squadron have been frequently and seriously interfered with by the prevailing epidemic I am not aware that the interests of our countrymen have suffered from inattention or from the absence of naval protection. The principal foreign ports within the limits of the squadron have been visited, some of them repeatedly, and the countries affected by domestic disturbance, or where there were foreign enemies, have invariably had a man-of-war in port when needed.

Vera Cruz and Tampico, in Mexico; the ports of Hayti and St. Domingo, countries afflicted with perpetual discontent and revolution; Aspinwall, Carthagena, and other places in Colombia, where a revolution of Government has taken place, have been visited by Rear Admiral Palmer, and the flag-ship or one of the squadron has always been near when the presence of a naval vessel would be likely to exercise a beneficial influence.

In August last Rear Admiral Palmer had an interview at Panama with General Gutierrez, the president of Colombia, who expressed great regard for our country, and especially for American interests on the isthmus, where the faithful observance of treaty stipulations he considered mutually beneficial to his country and our own.

Preceding and attending the surrender of Vera Cruz great judgment and address were exhibited by Commander Roe, the naval commander stationed at that place. Repeated negotiations had been opened between the imperial and republican commanders, without final results. When at length, through the friendly offices of Commander Roe and the American and British consuls, an arrangement was made for the transfer of the place, it was interrupted by the arrival of the steamer Virginia from New York with General Santa Anna, who proceeded at once to the castle, which was in command of one of his friends. Santa Anna declared that he brought letters from the United States Government, and many believed he was its authorized agent. Great excitement for a while prevailed, and a revolution seemed imminent, but, by prompt and decisive measures, this difficulty was disposed of. Santa Anna left the port, and on the 27th of June a transfer of the place and a peaceful embarkation of the foreign legion followed.

Commander Roe is entitled to commendation for the discretion and zeal which he manifested. To his good judgment, in concert with that of our consul, the surrender of Vera Cruz without disaster or bloodshed is attributed.

The naval station at Port Royal has been discontinued and after shipping to other places most of the movable naval property a sale of the remainder and of the buildings at Bay Point has been effected. Key West has been made the principal depot for supplies for this squadron.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

40TH CONG...2D SESS.

Admiral Tamandaré of his orders to proceed to Asuncion for the purpose of placing the United States minister at his post.

Objection was made to the passage of the Shamokin through the lines of his squadron by the Brazilian admiral, who was without instructions from his Government, but when informed by Commander Crosby that force alone would prevent the execution of his orders the Shamokin was allowed to proceed, under protest, to Campayti, beyond the line of the blockade, from whence, after the customary preliminary salutes of the Paraguayan flag, a letter was sent to President Lopez. Obstructions in the river made it dangerous to proceed further and the minister was there landed. The Shamokin immediately withdrew from the line of the belligerents. Although objection was made to the passage of the Shamokin, in order that it should not serve as a precedent, the most friendly relations were maintained by the American and Brazilian officers.

Rear Admiral Godon during the month of April visited, in the Wasp, the towns on the Uruguay river as far as Concepcion, the capital of the province of Entre Rios. The prevalence of cholera prevented him from carrying out his design of proceeding as far at least as Rosario.

Early in January the Kansas, Commander Wells, left Montevideo for a cruise on the west coast of Africa. This vessel visited the Cape of Good Hope, St. Paul de Loando, Benguela, and Little Fish bay. No American slaves were heard of at any of those points, and from English officers, met with along the coast, and from the Governors of Loando and St. Helena, information direct was received that the shameful traffic has virtually ceased. One vessel, a small brig without name or flag, and without human cargo, had been captured by an English steamer and sent to St. Helena and condemned.

NORTH PACIFIC SQUADRON.

The North Pacific squadron remains in command of Rear Admiral H. K. Thatcher, and is composed of the following vessels:

Pensacola, (flag-ship).....	20 guns.
Saranac.....	11 "
Lackawanna.....	7 "
Ossipee.....	6 "
Rosaca.....	8 "
Mohican.....	7 "
Swanance.....	10 "

Cyane, (store and hospital ship.)

These vessels have been employed during the year in watching and protecting the persons and property of our countrymen and the welfare and interests of the United States in Mexico and on the isthmus, where war and internal difficulties and disturbances have been threatening, or have to a great extent prevailed. They have also been engaged in surveying and exploring the North Pacific ocean, and in visiting our recently acquired possessions in the north. Along the coast of Mexico, from Acapulco to the ports in the Gulf of California, which has been the field of operations of the French against the Mexican republic, one or more of the vessels of this squadron have been constantly cruising or in port, as the interests of our countrymen seemed to require.

The Lackawanna since her arrival in the Pacific has been most of the time cruising among the Sandwich islands, a locality of great and increasing interest and importance. In May she visited the French Frigate shoals and brought to Honolulu twenty-seven of the officers and crew of the Daniel Wood, an American whale-ship which had been wrecked. Recently she has been engaged in examining and surveying the islands, reefs, and reported dangers which lie northwesterly from the Sandwich group toward Japan. Many of them have not been surveyed, nor their positions reliably established. The acquisition of Russian America will call for more extensive operations on the part of this squadron, and, in connection with our increasing commerce with Japan and China, and the rising importance of the States on the Pacific, a more thorough exploration and survey of the North Pacific ocean is necessary.

Information in regard to the newly acquired territory is wanted, and early in the season Rear Admiral Thatcher was instructed to send one or more of our naval vessels to visit the most important points, to cruise among the islands, and report in detail in regard to the topographical and hydrographical condition of the country, its harbors, productions, fisheries, timber, and other resources. The transfer of the territory was consummated at so late a period that but little can be accomplished until another season.

In conformity with instructions previously given, the Ossipee, Captain Emmons, was detailed to convey the commissioners to Alaska, and General Rousseau and Captain Pestchouff, the Russian commissioner, left San Francisco in that vessel on the 27th of September for Sitka.

It became necessary last spring to order the Jamestown, then stationed at Panama, to a northern climate, as many of her crew were prostrated with fever, and several cases terminated fatally. The Resaca, which succeeded the Jamestown at Panama, became similarly affected, and both vessels proceeded from San Francisco to Sitka in the month of August.

SOUTH PACIFIC SQUADRON.

Rear Admiral George F. Pearson was relieved of the command of the South Pacific squadron by Rear Admiral John A. Dahlgren on the 12th of December last at Panama. But a single change has been made in this squadron during the year—the detachment of the storeship Parallones. It consists at this time of the—

The continuation of the war between Spain and the republics of Chili and Peru, though not prosecuted with much activity, has in some measure limited the operations of this squadron and rendered it expedient that the vessels should remain chiefly on the coast and in the ports of the republics. The progress of these international difficulties has been watched with interest by Rear Admiral Dahlgren, who has been prepared to furnish whatever aid and protection our citizens needed and which the law justified. He has also cooperated with Rear Admiral Thatcher in preserving the safety of transit over the isthmus. The limits of this squadron, which extend westward to Australia, embrace a vast field for naval exploration and cruising, and might occupy the officers and vessels usefully and with advantage to our commercial interests were they not required in particular localities. The Tuscarora has in fact been engaged for a portion of the year in visiting Tahiti and some others of the Society islands. At the Féeje islands Captain Stanley cooperated with the vice consul in measures to secure the payment of awards made in 1855 and 1858 to certain citizens of the United States for injuries and losses sustained from acts of the natives.

The disturbed and revolutionary condition of affairs in Colombia, in May and June led to serious apprehensions that a civil war would prevail throughout the republic. At Panama some movements toward increased and unlawful taxation caused dissatisfaction among the foreign merchants, and a public meeting was held by the consuls and commanders of vessels of war, at which a remonstrance against the alleged illegal proceedings was adopted. After some correspondence a compromise was effected, by which the merchants at Panama and Colon (Aspinwall) consented to pay their regular tax three months in advance, without any increase.

Commander Bradford, who was at Panama in the Resaca when these difficulties took place, was vigilant and prompt in attending to the interests of our citizens, and in advising the department of what transpired. The commanders-in-chief of both the North and South Pacific squadrons, as well as Rear Admiral Palmer on the Atlantic coast, were informed of the unsettled condition of affairs, and instructed to be vigilant in guarding the persons and property of our citizens in that quarter, to attend to the safety and security of passengers and merchandise crossing the isthmus, and, for the time being, to have a suitable naval force in that vicinity in anticipation of, and to guard against, serious disturbance, which might be injurious to American interests, but not to interfere in the controversy in a manner to involve the Government or to violate neutrality. Happily, the difficulties passed away and a civil revolution was effected without much internal commotion or foreign complications.

SPECIAL SERVICE.

In my last annual report it was stated that the steam frigate Susquehanna was on special service, having been ordered to convey our minister and Lieutenant General Sherman to Vera Cruz. The then unsettled condition of affairs in Mexico, and especially in and about Vera Cruz, prevented the mission from landing, and the Susquehanna returned with them to the United States. It was deemed important, however, to continue one or more of our naval vessels at Vera Cruz until the foreign troops then in that country had embarked and tranquillity was restored to the republic.

Information having been received from Captain W. H. Russell, of the merchant ship Cultivator, that his ship had struck heavily several times on a shoal not laid down upon any chart, about twenty miles to the westward of George's shoal, his vessel drawing twenty-two and a half feet of water at the time, the Department sent the United States steamer Don, Commander Ralph Chandler, to search for and, if found, to survey this obstruction to navigation. The shoal was discovered, and was found to extend about five miles in a southeast and northwest direction, and the soundings on it to vary from three to nine fathoms. The soundings in the vicinity of the shoal change from fifty to fourteen fathoms, and its approach is only indicated by the breakers or rips, which in clear weather are visible for several miles. As this shoal lies directly in the track of vessels bound to and from Europe, it is not improbable that some of the vessels whose fate is unknown may have here struck, and in heavy weather have gone to pieces. The survey made by Commander Chandler was published at the hydrographic office in June last.

The Sacramento, Captain Collins, which was mentioned in my last annual report as being on special service, and which has been wrecked, as is elsewhere noticed, visited the island of Madeira; the Canary islands; the Cape de Verde islands; Monrovia; Cape Palmas, Axim; St. George del Mina, Dutch Guinea; Acera; Jella Coffy; Prince's island; island of St. Thomas; St. Paul de Loando; St. Philip de Benguela; Elephant bay; Little Fish bay; Saldanha bay; Cape Town; Mauritius; Point de Galle and Trincomalie, Ceylon; Pondicherry, Coromandel coast, and Madras. While at Monrovia, Captain Collins, at the request of President Warner, of Liberia, called a council of the head men of certain unfriendly tribes in the vicinity, and endeavored to persuade them by concessions and conciliation to make a lasting peace.

The graduating class at the Naval Academy this year was larger than usual, and as nearly all the vessels needing midshipmen were on foreign service, the Minnesota, Commodore James Alden, was put in commission for the purpose of giving the midshipmen instruction in the first duties of naval officers after graduating, of enabling them to see foreign dockyards and naval establishments, and for distribution to the naval vessels to which they were to be assigned. The Minnesota sailed from New York on the 24th of July, having on board forty-six midshipmen, and she has visited a number of the principal ports on the European coast, and has passed up the Mediterranean as far as Toulon. She is to return by the way of Aspinwall, where all the midshipmen not assigned to the European squadron will be detached and join vessels on the Pacific stations.

The Michigan has been employed in her usual duties on the lakes.

LOSS OF THE SACRAMENTO.

The Sacramento, Captain Napoleon Collins, which was performing an important and interesting cruise, was wrecked on the 19th of June last in the bay of Bengal, on the reefs off the mouth of the Kothapalem, a branch of the Godavery river, Madras district. The vessel proved a total wreck, but happily no lives were lost. Two strong rafts were constructed during the night of the 19th, and on the succeeding morning one of them, with a part of the officers and men, was safely towed to the shore. The other, having on it twenty-nine officers and men, was swept out to sea by the tide and currents, but fortunately those upon it were rescued the next day, about twelve miles from the wreck of the ship, by the British mail steamer Arabia, Captain Ballantine, who, in order to land them, deviated some twenty miles from his course. The remaining officers and men safely reached the shore in the boats of the ship and by the aid of other rafts—the last man leaving on the morning of the 21st. The spot where they landed was a sterile beach without water, and the natives could neither supply them with food nor render any other assistance. They worked their way in their boats to the French town of Yanaon, and from thence to Madras. Every assistance was rendered them at these places by the civil officers and citizens, and by officers of naval and merchant vessels, and they were not only provided with the necessaries, but with the luxuries of life. Captain Collins, with his officers and the crew of the Sacramento, sailed from Cocanada on the 17th of August, in the ship General Caulfield, and arrived in New York on the 19th of November. As is usual in such cases a court of inquiry has been ordered, and is now in session.

IRON-CLAD MIAANTOMOH.

At the date of my last report the iron-clad Miantonomoh was in European waters. She passed up the Mediterranean as far as Naples, visiting several intermediate ports, and returning left Gibraltar on the 15th of May, en route to the United States. She returned by the way of the Canary, Cape de Verde, and West India islands, and reached Philadelphia on the 22d of July, having steamed during her absence from the United States 17,767 miles.

The cruise of the Miantonomoh to Europe and her return, and of the Monadnock to San Francisco, are the most remarkable voyages ever undertaken by turreted iron-clad vessels. These vessels encountered every variety of weather, and under all circumstances proved themselves to be staunch, reliable sea-going ships. The monitor type of vessel has been constructed primarily for harbor defense, and it was not contemplated that they would do more than move from port to port on our own coast. These voyages demonstrate their ability to go to any part of the world, and it is believed by experienced naval officers that with slight modifications above the water-line, in no way interfering with their efficiency in action, they will safely make the longest and most difficult voyages without convoy.

Steam, turreted iron-clads and fifteen-inch guns have revolutionized naval warfare, and foreign Governments, becoming sensible of this great change, are slowly but surely coming to the conclusion that turreted vessels and heavy ordnance are essential parts of an efficient fighting navy.

NEW VESSELS.

Four new vessels have been launched during the year: the Moshulu, 1,448 tons, at New York, on the 22d of December; the Minnetonka, 2,490 tons, at Kittery, on the 3d of July; the Pushmataha, 1,448 tons, at Philadelphia, on the 17th of July; and the Nantasket, 523 tons, at Charlestown, on the 15th of August.

The construction of these vessels was well advanced before the close of the war, but their final completion has not been pressed, and work has been done upon them only when it could be most economically accomplished. The machinery for these vessels is now being placed on board, and they will be ready for service in the course of the ensuing year. The Guerriere, a vessel similar to the Minnetonka, is the flag-ship of the South Atlantic squadron, and her performance under steam and sail, and with both combined, has been well spoken of. The Piscataqua, of the same class, is under orders, and will sail in a few days as the flag-ship of the Asiatic squadron.

The steam machinery is completed for seven more vessels of this class, but it is not the intention of the Department to commence their construction at present. A smaller vessel is found to be more serviceable and convenient for general purposes, and the building of four a trifle larger than the Nantasket has been commenced—the Algoma, at Kittery; the Alaska, at Charlestown; the Kenosha, at New York, and the Omaha, at Philadelphia. These vessels will be completed in the fall and winter of the ensuing year. They are necessary to replace vessels of the permanent Navy which have been lost or were so much damaged during the war that their further repair is inexpedient. The machinery for these vessels is already completed.

There are several vessels on the stocks at the different yards, upon which work has been wholly suspended, and in all of which some portion of the machinery has been placed. At the Kittery yard is the Illinois of 2,490 tons and the iron-clad Passaconaway of 2,127 tons. At the Charlestown yard the Pompanoosuc of 2,869 tons and the iron-clad Quinsigamond of 2,127 tons; also the ship-of-the-line Virginia, the keel of which was laid in 1820, and which when launched can only be used as a receiving-ship. At the New York yard the Ontario of 2,490 tons and the iron-clad Kalamazoo of 2,127 tons. At the Philadelphia yard the iron-clad Shakamaxon of 2,127 tons. Besides these vessels upon which no work is being done there is at the New York yard the Java; at the Philadelphia yard the Antietam, and at the Charlestown yard the Kewadin, each of 2,490 tons, which are not under permanent cover, and upon which a small amount of work is being done to put them in condition to be at least partially protected from deterioration by the weather, as it may be many years before they will be launched. The Neshaminy and Ammonoosuc of 2,019 tons are receiving their machinery at the wharves of the contractors in New York.

The appropriation for all of these vessels was made prior to the close of the war, and the construction of all but the four small vessels whose keels have recently been laid was commenced months before hostilities terminated.

NAVY-YARD FACILITIES.

The experience of the last seven years has demonstrated the importance of more extensive areas and greater facilities at the navy-yards for the construction and repair of naval vessels and their machinery. Our navy-yards are too circumscribed in their limits, as well as too deficient in their means, to build and sustain a navy which is at all commensurate with our position and character among nations. More enlarged accommodations, where the work required can be better, more reliably, and so far as repairs are involved, more economically executed, should be provided.

Notwithstanding present deficiencies, and the unfinished condition of many of the shops and buildings, Congress omitted to make appropriations for improvements in any of the navy-yards for the current year. In consequence of this omission the estimates herewith presented for that head for the ensuing fiscal year, which will close on the 30th of June 1869, are necessarily increased.

Seav's island, adjacent to the Kittery navy-yard, is a valuable addition to that important station, and when Congress shall have made appropriation for its improvement, accommodations adequate to the public wants at that point may be expected to be made. No funds have been supplied by Congress for establishing any additional works on the island, or for extending the yard in that direction, consequently nothing has been done beyond the repairs and occupancy of the dwellings. Should Congress furnish the means this valuable acquisition may be easily made available for useful purposes, though the improvements must necessarily be the work of years.

The reasons stated in my last annual report for essential improvements at the Norfolk and Pensacola navy-yards are referred to, without repeating them in detail, as still existing, and every consideration of policy and duty calls for the necessary appropriations to place those establishments in a condition of usefulness to the country. In some respects the yard at Norfolk has advantages superior to any other station. Accessible as the harbor is at all seasons of the year, and having a permanent stone dry-dock already constructed, there is no reason why the facilities afforded should not be made available to the country.

The temporary arrangements which were made for the occupancy of the navy-yard at Pensacola still continue, and the buildings which were spared remain in a dilapidated and scarcely habitable condition. Kitchens and stables which escaped destruction are occupied as residences by the officers attached to the yard, with few of the conveniences and none of the comforts of home. In peaceable times the work at this yard will not be extensive, but being the only naval station on the Gulf of Mexico, and there being no large ports in that section where naval vessels can be repaired, it is important in an economical point of view, as well as advantageous in many respects, that this yard should be placed in a proper condition.

LEAGUE ISLAND.

The act of Congress approved February 18, 1867, authorized the acceptance of the title to League island "and adjacent marsh land, including the whole of the creek known as the back channel, from the Schuylkill to the Delaware river, and all the riparian rights and privileges of said League island, adjacent marsh, and back channel, together with so much of the opposite shore of the back channel from the League island shore as shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, be ample to enable the Government to have the sole and exclusive use of said back channel and both shores thereof;" provided "the acceptance thereof shall be recommended by a board of officers to be appointed by the President."

You were pleased to designate as members of the board Rear Admiral Charles H. Davis, United States Navy, president; Major General A. A. Humphreys, chief of engineer corps United States Army; Commodore James Alden, United States Navy; Chief Engineer J. W. King, United States Navy, and Professor J. E. Hilgard, of the coast survey. On the 11th of April the board reported that it "had read with scrupulous attention the several reports and opinions on the League island subject, and its suitability for naval purposes, proceeding from commissions of inquiry or from other official authorities; it has given a respectful and careful deliberation to the most prominent of the controversial pamphlets written on this subject; it has made a complete study of the original maps and plans of League island and the adjacent property, among which are included the early original manuscript topographical sheets of the United States coast survey; it has investigated the hydrographical features of the surrounding channels and basins; it has entered into a thorough personal examination of League island, of the opposite shore of the back channel, and of the channels themselves at different periods of the tide; it has bestowed its careful consideration upon the relation of all the various points and details involved to the present and future wants and purposes of the Navy of the United States, and especially their relation to the supplies of material, labor, and the sources of manufacturing power; and feeling assured that these deliberations, examinations, and studies, added to the knowledge and experience already possessed by its members, qualify it to form an opinion on the subject of League island in respect to its geological, topographical, and hydrographical conditions, in respect to defense, in respect to practical business and wants of navy-yards, docks, and dock-yards for vessels of wood and iron, and in respect to its adaptation for all naval purposes whatever, this board does not hesitate to recommend with entire unanimity that League island, the adjacent marshes, and back channel, together with so much of the opposite shore of the back channel from the League island shore as is hereinafter described, be accepted from Philadelphia, and be held for naval purposes by the Government of the United States."

The board also designated the quantity of land on the opposite shore from League island which, in its opinion, was necessary to enable the Government to have the exclusive use of the back channel and both shores thereof. A copy of this report was communicated to the mayor of Philadelphia, and he was notified that the Department was ready to accept the title to the property whenever it was perfected and offered for that purpose. After consultation the authorities of Philadelphia decided to ask a modification of the line recommended on the shore opposite to League island, as it was their intention to lay out an avenue one hundred and twenty feet wide, running the entire length of the island. Chief Engineer King was directed to cooperate with the city engineer and surveyor, and a line satisfactory to themselves was agreed upon. This was submitted to the board, of which Rear Admiral Davis was chairman, who recommend the acceptance of the modification proposed. The board say in their report that had they been acquainted with the plan of the city improvements they would have chosen the same or similar lines, and that "the interposition of Delaware avenue, which is one hundred and twenty feet broad, between the northern wall bounding the property of the United States and the buildings of the city, furnishes that security against nuisances and against accidents by fire which it was the first object of the board to provide."

It is provided by the act of February last that League island shall not be accepted until the title to the whole of the land necessary to enable the Government to control both shores of the back channel is complete and indefeasible. As the land on the shore opposite League island belongs to various parties, some of whom are minors, and as some of it is held in trust, it became necessary, in order to make perfect titles under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, as well as to fix a price, for the city of Philadelphia to call for the intervention of a jury. This jury has not yet reported, but is shortly expected to do so, and I am informed by the mayor of Philadelphia that he has reason to believe that about the commencement of the ensuing year everything will be in readiness to complete the transfer from the city to the national Government. The city of Philadelphia has been ready to transfer League island proper on the terms originally proposed, without any delay, and since the designation of the adjoining property, it has not been negligent in its efforts to acquire a legal title, in order to comply with the requirements of Congress.

SITE ON THE THAMES RIVER FOR NAVAL PURPOSES.

A clause in the act making appropriations for the naval service, approved March 2, 1867, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy "to receive and accept a deed of gift, when offered by the State of Connecticut, of a tract of land situated on the Thames river, near New London, Connecticut, with a water front of not less than one mile, to be held by the United States for naval purposes." On the 25th of September his excellency the Governor of Connecticut transmitted to the Department a copy of an act passed by the General Assembly of that State appropriating $15,000 to aid the city of New London in the purchase of the requisite property, and making other necessary provisions for carrying the act into effect, and inviting me to designate some one to unite with the commissioners to be appointed by him in selecting and locating such a site as is contemplated in the act. In compliance with the request of Governor English, Commodore J. P. McKinstry was detailed for that purpose, and in the latter part of October he proceeded to New London and examined, with Messrs. Ingersoll, Blackstone, and Hollister, commissioners on the part of the State, the proposed site. No transfer of the property has yet been made to the Government, but Commodore McKinstry reports to the Department that the tract of land which it is proposed to cede is on the east shore of the Thames river, situated partly in the towns of Ledyard and Groton, with a water front of one mile, as provided by act of Congress, and a breadth varying from six hundred to seven hundred feet. The south line of the tract is about two miles above New London, and five miles north of the light-house at the entrance of the Thames. The channel of the river adjacent to the tract of land selected has a depth of water of not less than four and a half fathoms.

TRANSFER OF IRON-CLAD STEAMERS.

By an act of March 2, 1867, the Secretary of the Navy was authorized and directed to deliver to George W. Quintard, of New York, for his own use and behoof, the United States iron-clad Onondaga, upon payment by said Quintard, his heirs and assigns, to the Treasury of the United States of the sum of $759,673. In pursuance of this act the iron-clad steamer Onondaga was, on the 12th day of July last, transferred to Mr. Quintard, that gentleman having deposited the amount therein specified.

By an act of the same date the Secretary of the Navy was authorized and directed to release to William H. Webb, of New York, all right, title, interest, and demand of the United States in and to the iron-clad steamship Dunderberg, built by said Webb under contract with the Navy Department, upon payment by him into the Treasury of the United States of any and all sums of money paid or advanced by the Secretary, or by his order, to said Webb on account of said contract. There had been paid to Mr. Webb, on his contract for this vessel, $1,041,666 67, which amount he deposited in the Treasury, and on receipt from the Assistant Treasurer at New York of a certificate to that effect a release of the vessel took place and Mr. Webb became her owner.

REBEL RAM STONEWALL.

The rebel ram Stonewall, which was delivered by the rebels to the Spanish authorities at Havana, and by them turned over to the United States, was on the 5th of August transferred to the Government of Japan at her appraised value of $400,000. Since coming into our possession she had been lying in the waters of the Potomac, and as she was constructed of wood, and liable to rapid deterioration if unused, her retention for our service was not deemed advisable. The negotiations for her sale were conducted through the Department of State, and were made with the approval of the Government.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

The Naval Academy continues under the able superintendence of Vice Admiral Porter, whose report, together with that of the Board of Visitors, is appended. These papers show that the Academy is satisfactorily fulfilling the work assigned it in educating and molding the character of the future officers of the Navy. The standard for general instruction will compare favorably with that of other educational institutions, and the special training required to prepare the students for the naval service is thorough and satisfactory. Some additional facilities are needed, both in the academic and steam department, for which estimates have been submitted. A further purchase of land and the erection of additional buildings are also desirable. The department of natural and experimental philosophy, especially, needs enlarged and better accommodations, and the discipline of the Academy would be much benefited if all the officers could live within the grounds of the institution instead of being compelled to occupy very indifferent quarters outside. Two convenient dwellings have been completed during the year at a moderate cost, and the erection of ten more is recommended.

The superintendent of the Academy, the chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, and the Board of Visitors call attention to the insufficient arrangements for the sick. The hospital will only accommodate twelve, with two in a room, and the daily average of sick is very much larger. Humanity requires that a site remote from disturbing causes should be purchased and a suitable building erected without delay.

The new chapel is nearly finished, and the large building designed for quarters for the midshipmen is under contract, to be completed in season for occupancy at the commencement of the next academic year.

The graduating class the present year numbered eighty-seven. The undergraduates were at sea from two to three months for practice in the sloops-of-war Macedonian, Savannah, and Dale.

NAVAL APPRENTICES.

The naval apprentice system, to which reference has been made in former reports, continues to receive the special care and attention of the Department, and the results thus far have been more satisfactory than could have been reasonably anticipated at the time the enlistment of apprentice boys was revived, about three years since. There are occasionally mistaken ideas on the part of parents and guardians as to the end to be attained by enlistment, but by far the greater proportion, as well as the apprentices themselves, have a just appreciation of the benefits to be received. The education of the boys as seamen does not cease with their transfer from the apprentice ships to sea-going vessels. Those in service on board our men-of-war are being educated and prepared for the higher duties of seaman-ship, and such as identify themselves with the Navy by twenty years' service become beneficiaries under the act of March 2, 1867, and are provided for in age. By its policy the Government is giving a stimulus to a long-desired and greatly-needed improvement in the moral and intellectual character of the seamen of the country and establishing among them an abiding attachment for the naval service.

The authorized annual number of apprentices for admission to the Naval Academy, though this year increased to ten, was selected without difficulty by competitive examination from those who were eligible under the law, and several others, who were nominated from the school-ships by members of Congress, passed the required examination.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

The increasing number of applicants for enlistment rendered necessary an increase in the facilities for instruction, and accordingly the sloops-of-war Portsmouth and Saratoga have been put in commission, and, with the Sabine, will be used exclusively as apprentice ships. The station of the Sabine is at New London and vicinity, the Portsmouth will be in Hampton roads and Chesapeake bay, and the Saratoga in New York.

SEAMEN.

I have heretofore repeatedly invited attention to the importance of legislation to improve the condition of our seamen, both in the naval and mercantile service, and I again ask a recurrence to these suggestions, particularly to those made in my last annual report. The apprentice ships will gradually furnish a class of men educated to the naval service, and every reasonable inducement should be held out to them to continue in that branch of sea life in which they have been trained. The longer a seaman continues in the Navy the more valuable he becomes, and it is worthy of consideration whether in lieu of the bounty now paid for the reenlistment of those who have been honorably discharged, or in addition thereto, an increased rate of monthly wages may not be advantageously given for every honorable discharge, so that for those who creditably serve their enlistments the inducement to continue in the Navy will increase with their years of service, until finally, when they are entitled to retire upon half pay for life, after an enlistment of twenty or more years as now provided by law, their compensation will be such that their half pay will give them a comfortable support if they choose to accept it in lieu of a home at the Naval Asylum.

Additional legislation is also needed to retain the services of those who voluntarily enlist. Punishment cannot now reach a deserter except by the tedious and expensive process of a court-martial. It is suggested that a more summary way to deal with deserters be authorized, and that they be by law required to serve the full term of enlistment exclusive of the time they may have absented themselves, as is now provided for the military service, and that they be liable to trial by court-martial even if not arrested until after their term of enlistment has expired.

It is also recommended that for the purposes of the naval service the age of enlisted persons, as sworn to at the time of enlistment, shall be held to be their true age, and that persons who have declared themselves to be of the requisite age shall not be discharged by any process of court, either State or Federal.

EXAMINATION OF VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

The board for the examination of volunteer officers for admission into the regular Navy, in conformity with the provisions of the act of July 25, 1866, has been in session at intervals during the entire year, and has submitted its final report of officers examined. A very small number on foreign service, and some who have been recommended for admission under the last clause of the third section of the act under which the board was convened, have not been finally examined, and for this purpose it will be necessary to convene a board of officers at some future time. The law gave the Department no authority to make selections or recommendations, but left the whole matter in the hands of a board, which was to select and recommend the authorized number in the several grades, provided so many were found qualified. The report of the board has not, therefore, received any revision by the Department, and the names of the several officers found qualified will, in accordance with their recommendation, be forwarded to you at an early day for transmission to the Senate for confirmation.

RANK OF STAFF CORPS.

The chiefs of the Bureaus of Medicine and Surgery of Provisions and Clothing, and of Steam Engineering, bring to the notice of the Department the claims of their respective corps to increased rank. It is urged that by the recent creation of the several grades of admiral, of commodore, and lieutenant commander, the rank of the staff corps has in effect been reduced. The law now provides for the appointment of fleet surgeons, fleet paymasters, and fleet engineers, but the rank is only temporary, ceasing when the officer is detached from fleet duty. If these grades were made permanent and to embrace a sufficient number for the service required of the officers standing at the head of their respective lists and the rank now temporarily given to fleet officers and to the other grades legalized, it is thought that the staff corps would be generally satisfied. It is understood that they propose to bring the matter of increased rank to the notice of Congress, and such legislation as may seem equitable and just is recommended.

RELIEF FOR THE SOUTHERN STATES.

A joint resolution, approved February 22, 1867, authorized and directed the Secretary of the Navy, upon application of the contributors, to assign a public vessel for the transportation under such regulations as he might prescribe, to Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile, of any supplies of food and clothing that might be contributed by the people of the United States for the use of any portion of the people of the southern States who were suffering from the failure of crops or other causes.

In accordance with this resolution two public vessels of the Navy were put in commission and assigned to the purpose indicated. One, the Purveyor, was placed at the disposal of the Southern Relief Commission at New York; the other, the Relief, was placed at the disposal of the Southern Relief Association at Baltimore.

The Purveyor made two trips, one in March and one in June, to the South as far as Mobile, carrying such provisions and other articles as were placed on board by the commission at New York. The Relief sailed from Baltimore in May and proceeded to Mobile, where she discharged her cargo and returned.

As the Department had no suitable vessel of light draught to enable it to send provisions to Wilmington, Congress, by resolution approved on the 29th of March, directed it to charter a vessel to convey contributions from Baltimore to that point. It was found, however, that the employment of the usual freighting lines was more economical, and such supplies as were offered were in that way transported at a cost of $1,506 89. No appropriation having been made for this service, the expense was defrayed from the contingent fund of the Department.

CLAIMS OF CONTRACTORS.

An act of Congress approved March 2, 1867, directs the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the claims of contractors for vessels of war and steam machinery for relief, upon a basis therein named. To give the several claims a thorough examination it became necessary to convene a board, and Commodore J. B. Marchand, Chief Engineer J. W. King, and Paymaster E. Foster were selected. The sessions of the board commenced on the 8th of July, the several contractors having previously been directed to prepare and forward to the Department a statement in detail of the several claims, fortified by such proofs as they could furnish. The board permitted each contractor to appear before them in person or by attorney, and gave a patient and searching examination to the several claims. Their report will be submitted to Congress at an early day.

PETROLEUM AS FUEL FOR GENERATING STEAM.

The act approved April 17, 1866, appropriated $5,000 for testing the use of petroleum as a fuel under marine boilers. An elaborate series of experiments has been made at the New York and Boston navy-yards, and a very full synopsis of the information gathered is given in the report of the chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering. The conclusion arrived at is that convenience, comfort, health, and safety are against the use of petroleum in steam vessels, and that the only advantage thus far shown is a not very important reduction in bulk and weight of fuel carried.

STEAMER AMAZON.

The attention of the Department has been called to the interest and rights of the captors in the case of the Amazon. This was an iron steamer captured by the Pontiac, Commander S. B. Luce, on the 2d of March, 1865. She was appraised by order of Rear Admiral Dahlgren and taken into service, libeled as prize in the eastern district of Pennsylvania, but under an order of court was surrendered to the claimant on his paying into court $8,000. On trial the Amazon was condemned as prize, but the Secretary of the Treasury remitted the forfeiture, and the $8,000, instead of being paid to the captors and naval pension fund, in conformity to law, were repaid to Dillon, the claimant. Of this proceeding this Department was wholly unadvised, and had no notice whatever until after the money had been paid to Dillon, and the time allowed by law for repeal had elapsed.

The captors who were thus deprived of the share of the prize money to which, under the capture and condemnation, they consider themselves legally entitled, will appeal to Congress for the money which, by law and the decision of the court, they believe to be due them. The naval pension fund is also entitled to its moiety of the money which has been relinquished.

NAVAL PENSION FUND.

The naval pension fund has been increased during the year $1,250,000, making the aggregate at the present time $13,000,000. This amount having accrued to the United States from the sale of prizes, the public faith is pledged that it "shall be and remain forever a fund for the payment of pensions to the officers, seamen, and marines who may be entitled to receive the same." It is also provided that if the fund shall be more than sufficient the surplus shall be applied to the making of further provision for the comfort of disabled officers, seamen, and marines. To partially comply with this requirement, the act of March 2, 1867, provides for giving a cash pension in lieu of a home at the Naval Asylum to those who have been twenty years in the service, and authorizes relief for a specified time to those who have been disabled after ten years' enlistment. The benefit of this act has thus far been given to but seven persons, and though the number may be considerably increased, it is probable that a portion only of the surplus will be used in this way. I recommend, therefore, that the pension laws applicable to the Navy be revised, and such an increase in the rates of pension be authorized as the fund will warrant. The entire principal of the fund was earned by the officers and men of the Navy during the recent war, and it is eminently proper that its benefits should be enjoyed by those whom the war has deprived of other support, as contemplated by the statute. In this revision provision should also be made for pensions for the admiral, vice admiral, rear admiral, commodore, and other grades, both of the line and staff, now wholly omitted. It may also be well to consider whether the family of a person dying in the Navy after a specified time of service should not derive some benefit from this surplus fund, even though the death should not have occurred in the strict "line of duty."

NAVAL PENSIONS.

During the year ending November 1, 1867, there has been an increase of twenty-nine on the invalid pension-roll, and of one hundred and eighty-four on the widows' and orphans' roll, making a total of two hundred and thirteen, and calling for $49,089 20 more than the

Since the close of the war no appropriations have been required for the construction and repair of vessels for steam machinery, ordnance, provisions and clothing, fuel, hemp, &c., the balances under these several heads having been more than ample for current expenditures. In my last annual report attention was called to the existence of large balances under those heads, and it was suggested that they could be disposed of by Congress in order that future expenditures might be made after specific appropriation following the close scrutiny which has been deemed essential to correct administration. As no action was taken by Congress, on the 30th September last, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved May 1, 1820, I requested the Secretary of the Treasury to carry to the surplus fund appropriations to the amount of $65,000,000, leaving under these several heads an amount only sufficient for the expenditures of the current fiscal year. In this sum of $65,000,000 are embraced the amount received from the sales of vessels and other war property of no service in time of peace, the amount refunded to the Government by the builders of the Dunderberg and Onondaga, as well as the balance of appropriations under the heads for which nothing has been asked for the last two years, not required for the current year.

In accordance with the views herein expressed estimates have been submitted for the entire expenses of the Department for the ensuing fiscal year, which of course make a larger aggregate than for the past two years, when only partial estimates were made. Estimates have also been made for amounts sufficient to complete the buildings and works which are unfinished, and to place the different navy-yards in an efficient condition, amounting to over $10,000,000. This expenditure, should the appropriation be made, would run through several years; the improvements being of a character requiring time for their completion.

At the close of the war, in the spring of 1865, the Department had heavy contracts in the process of fulfillment for vessels, engines, ordnance, &c. Good faith required that these should be completed, and the expenditures of the Department for the past two years have, for these reasons, been necessarily large for a peace establishment. Nearly all the war liabilities are now closed, arrangements having been made with some of the manufacturers of engines for which no vessels have been provided, to take the engines and relieve them from further responsibility. The expenditures of the Department were over $12,000,000 less during the last year than for the preceding fiscal year.

To return to the Treasury $65,000,000, besides meeting the extraordinary expenditures of the heaviest branches of the service for three years, must be regarded as evidence that the business of the Department has been conducted with economy, as well as that care has been taken by those intrusted with the disposition of useless public property to realize the nearest approximation to its value; and is a financial exhibit exceedingly gratifying to the Department.

THE BUREAUX.

The reports of the chiefs of bureaux and of the commandant of the Marine corps contain detailed statements of the operations of their several departments during the year, with suggestions for the future. The principal points touched upon are the following:

The chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks reports the expenditures for improvements and repairs in the several navy-yards during the last year, and explains in detail the estimates for the ensuing fiscal year for improvements. The immense expenditures for construction, repairs, and for machinery outside the yards, during the rebellion, has shown the necessity for enlarging the yards and increasing the facilities in the Government establishments, where the work is more reliably and economically done. Nothing was appropriated for improvements during the current year, and the estimates are consequently larger than usual. For the navy-yard at Kittery $17,828 is asked; for the Charlestown yard, $2,882,135; for the Brooklyn yard, $3,913,714; for the care and preservation of the property in the Philadelphia yard, $88,883—nothing being asked for permanent improvements, in view of the proposed removal of the yard to League island; for the Washington yard the estimates amount to $426,415; for the Norfolk yard, $646,145; for the Pensacola yard, $1,256,885; for the yard at Mare island, California, $530,433; for the stations at Key West, Sackett's Harbor, Mound City, and for the Naval Asylum, $138,000.

The chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting reports that during the year seventy-three vessels have been equipped for service, twenty-three of which have been wholly and several others partially wire rigged. The Government ropewalk at Charlestown has as heretofore supplied the hemp rigging used in the Navy, consuming in its manufacture 425 tons of hemp. The tests of the comparative strength of wire and hemp rope and the reports of commanders of wire-rigged vessels are so satisfactory that the bureau recommends the erection of a building and the purchase of suitable machinery for the manufacture of wire rigging. Attention is called to the suggestions of the chief of the bureau relative to offering greater inducements to seamen and ordinary seamen to enlist in the Navy, and also to the necessity for additional legislation to prevent desertions by providing more effectual punishment for that crime than now exists.

The chief of the Bureau of Navigation reports that the instruments, nautical books, charts, and other navigation supplies issued to naval vessels, are well cared for, and that a strict accountability is exacted of officers in charge. The subject of compass deviations has continued to receive the particular attention of the bureau, and it is believed that its efforts will result in furnishing a body of reliable practical data upon which to base a satisfactory judgment upon the quality of the compass and its use on board modern ships of war. The active coöperation of this Government with European Powers in developing the dangers to navigation in the Pacific and Indian oceans is recommended. The navigable waters of China and Japan, and in the vicinity of the territory recently acquired from Russia, are now visited at considerable risk of both life and property, and the interests of the commerce of all nations require that careful surveys be made. The hydrographic office has prepared a number of charts for publication, some of which have already been issued, and it is steadily progressing in the duties for which it was originally designed. The naval apprentice system continues to win favor, and the results are satisfactory. The new chapel and the additional quarters for midshipmen at the Naval Academy are now under construction. The accompanying reports of the superintendent of the Naval Observatory and of the Nautical Almanac show in detail their labors during the year.

The chief of the Bureau of Ordnance states that since the date of his last report all existing contracts for naval cannon have been completed, and that, with the exception of the fifteen-inch guns, the stock on hand will meet the wants of the service. There is also a superabundant supply of powder, projectiles, &c., to supply current demands. The trials of the navy fifteen-inch gun in England have fully vindicated the wisdom of the measure of introducing this caliber of cast-iron ordnance into our service. Wrought-iron gun-carriages are taking the place of the old wooden ones, and a steam gun-carriage for the manipulation of heavy ordnance, the invention of James B. Eads, Esq., of Missouri, has been tried during the past year with gratifying results. Breech-loading small-arms, in lieu of muzzle-loaders, are now being introduced into the service. Old, unserviceable, and surplus guns, powder, projectiles, &c., have been disposed of during the year, and $385,941 has been realized to the Treasury from this source.

The chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair reports that during the last year the work at the navy-yards has been mainly confined to the repair of vessels. The new work has been limited to the slow completion of the steam vessels, for the machinery of which contracts were made with private parties before the close of the war. Four have been launched during the year, and the construction of four of the smaller class has been commenced. Additional buildings are needed at the different yards for the economical working of the constructor's department. The chief of the bureau recommends that steps be taken for the professional education of naval constructors.

The chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering reports that no new machinery has been commenced during the year, and that the work at the different navy-yards has been limited to repairing and fitting out, and to the gradual completion of the machinery commenced before the termination of the war. The Franklin and Guerriere are the only new vessels with recently constructed engines that have made sea voyages, and the reports of the performance of their machinery are most satisfactory. A summary of the trial of competitive machinery erected in other large vessels is given. The machine shops at the different yards are inadequate for the operations which a sudden demand for war steamers would require, and the chief of the bureau earnestly hopes that the estimates asked for to put them in efficient condition may receive the favorable action of Congress.

The chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing reports that the large stock of stores on hand at the close of the war has been reduced to a standard sufficient only to meet the current wants of the service. He recommends that the custom of the English and French Navies, and of our own Army, of pur chasing the materials and making up a portion of the clothing used, be gradually introduced into our service, and that a part of the sailor's outfit be furnished him without charge.

The chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery presents not only the usual report of sickness and death in the Navy during the year, but gives in addition interesting tables showing the number of sick of each squadron engaged on the blockade during the war, together with the total of each disease treated, number of deaths on the blockade during the rebellion, proportion of deaths to the number of cases treated, and the proportion of deaths to the number of ship's company. The summary shows that from the commencement of the rebellion to the 30th of June, 1865, there were under treatment 114,038 cases; that there were 2,532 deaths, the proportion of deaths to the number of cases treated being .0175. At the close of the year 1865 there remained under treatment 853 cases; during the year 1866 there occurred 24,350 cases of disease, injury, &c., making a total of 25,203 cases treated during the year, of which 310 died; 23,954 were returned to duty or discharged the service, leaving 939 cases under treatment at the end of the year 1866. The proportion of cases admitted to the whole number of persons in the service was about $\frac{1}{46}$, or each person was on the sick list 1.46 times during the year. The proportion of deaths to the whole number in service was .018, and the per centage of deaths to the whole number of cases treated is .012, or less than two per cent.—taking the average strength of the Navy (officers, seamen, marines, engineer service and coast survey included) for the year 1866, to be 17,193. The total number of deaths from all causes, reported at the Navy Department from October 1, 1866, to September 30, 1867, is 395. The number of insane of the Navy under treatment in the Government Asylum near Washington, during the year ending 30th September, 1867, was 24; number now under treatment, 18. The necessity for enlarging the laboratory accommodation continues to press itself upon the attention of the Bureau, and estimates for this purpose have again been submitted.

The commandant of the Marine corps reports that at the annual inspection he found the troops in a thorough state of discipline and efficiency, and the several barracks and quarters in a creditable condition. The men are kept in constant readiness for duty at sea or on shore, and at short notice could be concentrated, in condition for effective service, at any point where the presence of troops might be required. The number of officers and men attached to vessels in commission is now somewhat less than usual. The new infantry tactics recently introduced into the Army has been adopted, and the corps is now being instructed in conformity therewith. Two officers and several men have died of yellow fever at Pensacola. The commandant of the corps renews the recommendation of last year that a new barracks be erected at Washington, a board composed of officers, a civil engineer, and master mechanic, after a thorough examination, having reported that it is not expedient to attempt to repair the present structures.

CONCLUSION.

In concluding this report it is gratifying to state that, while the reduction of vessels in commission has steadily progressed, and while our squadrons are limited to the smallest number of steamers compatible with the requirements of commerce, the protection of our countrymen, and the dignity and power of the nation, the vigilance and activity of our naval officers, with their small but efficient commands, have been such as to cause our flag to be exhibited in almost every important port on the globe; and it is a satisfaction to know that the demonstration of a naval force has everywhere been sufficient to cause it to be respected, and to give security to the persons and property of American citizens. Our commerce, which was seriously affected during the prevalence of civil war, in consequence of the countenance and encouragement extended to the rebels by foreign Governments, has not, from the continued unsettled condition of our domestic affairs, recovered its former vigor; but the Navy has, in guarding American interests and maintaining American rights, performed its duty, fostered trade, and, with the reestablishment of the Union, will contribute to restore our former commercial prosperity and success. If our ships and men in service are vastly inferior in numbers to other maritime Powers, it is a matter of just pride that, for efficiency in guarding the interests of our countrymen, in opening new avenues to trade, in exploring and rendering safe the ocean highways traversed by adventurous navigators, and for every useful purposes, they are surpassed by those of no other nation, and that they continue to assert our rights and maintain the credit and renown which has ever belonged to the American Navy.

GIDEON WELLES.

To the PRESIDENT.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, November 30, 1867.

In conformity with law, the Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to submit to Congress this his regular annual report.

The finances of the United States, notwithstanding the continued depreciation of the currency, are in a much more satisfactory condition than they were when the Secretary had the honor to make to Congress his last annual report. Since the 1st day of November, 1866, $493,990,268 84 of interest-bearing notes, certificates of indebtedness, and of temporary loans, have been paid or converted into bonds; and the public debt, deducting therefrom the cash in the Treasury, which is to be applied to its payment, has been reduced $59,805,555 72. During the same period decided improvement has also been witnessed in the general economical condition of the country. The policy of contracting the currency, although not enforced to the extent authorized by law, has prevented an expansion of credits, to which a redundant and especially a depreciated currency is always an incentive, and has had no little influence in stimulating labor and increasing production. Industry has been steadily returning to the healthy channels from which it was diverted during the war, and although incomes have been small, and trade generally inactive, in no other commercial country has there been less financial embarrassment than in the United States.

In order that the action of the Secretary, in the financial administration of the Department, may be properly understood, a brief reference to the condition of the Treasury at the time the war was drawing to a close, and at some subsequent periods, seems to be necessary.

On the 31st day of March, 1865, the total debt of the United States was $2,866,955,077 84, of the following descriptions, to wit:

Funded debt.....	$1,100,361,241 89
Matured debt.....	319,439 09
Temporary loan certificates.....	52,452,328 29
Certificates of indebtedness.....	171,790,000 00
Interest-bearing notes.....	536,812,800 00
Suspended or unpaid requisitions.....	111,256,518 93
United States notes (legal tenders).....	433,169,569 00
Fractional currency.....	24,254,094 07
Cash in Treasury.....	2,423,437,002 18
	53,481,924 84
Total.....	$2,866,955,077 84

The resources of the Treasury consisted of the money in the public depositories in different parts of the country, amounting as above stated to $56,481,924 84; the revenues from internal taxes and customs duties, and the authority to issue bonds, notes, and certificates, under the following acts to the following amounts:

Act of February 25, 1862, bonds.....	$4,023,600 00
Act of March 3, 1864, bonds.....	27,229,900 00
Act of June 30, 1864, bonds, 7-20 or compound-interest notes.....	79,811,000 00
Certificates for temporary loans, act June 30, 1864.....	97,546,471 71
United States notes for payment of temporary loans, act July 11, 1862.....	16,839,431 00
Fractional currency, act June 30, 1864.....	25,745,995 93
Act of March 3, 1865, bonds or interest-bearing notes.....	523,587,200 00
Making a total of.....	$784,783,508 64

Certificates of indebtedness, payable one year from date, or earlier at the option of the Government, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, might be issued to an indefinite amount, but only to public creditors desirous of receiving them in satisfaction of audited and settled demands against the United States.

Early in April the fall of Richmond and the surrender of the forces which had so long defended it rendered it certain that the war was soon to be terminated, and that provision must be made for the payment of the Army at the earliest practicable moment.

The exigency was great, and the prospect of raising the money required to meet the present and prospective demands upon the Treasury, under the laws then existing, was sufficiently discouraging to create solicitude and anxiety in the mind of a Secretary little experienced in public affairs, upon whom the responsibility of maintaining the credit of the nation had been unexpectedly devolved. There was no time to try experiments or to correct errors, if any had been committed, in the kind of securities which had been put upon the market. Creditors were importunate, the unpaid requisitions in the Department were largely in excess of the cash in the Treasury, the vouchers issued to contractors for the necessary supplies of the Army and Navy were being sold at from ten to twenty per cent. discount—indicating by their depreciation how uncertain was the prospect of early payment—while nearly a million men were soon to be discharged from service, who could not be mustered out until the means to pay the large balances due them were provided. There was no alternative but to raise money by popular subscription to Government securities of a character the most acceptable to the people, who had subscribed so liberally to previous loans.

As a considerable amount of the seventy notes had recently been disposed of satisfactorily by the Department, and had proved to be the most popular security ever offered to the people, the Secretary determined to rely upon them, (although on the part of the Government they were in many respects objectionable,) and in order to insure speedy subscriptions to place them within the reach of all who might be willing to invest in them. In every city and town and village of the loyal and at some points in the disloyal States subscriptions were solicited. The press, with its immense power, and without distinction of party, seconded the efforts of the energetic and skillful agent who had charge of the loan. The national banks gave efficient aid by liberal subscriptions, while thousands of persons in humble life and with limited means hesitated not to commit their substance to the honor and good faith of the Government. Before the end of July the entire loan, exceeding five hundred millions, was subscribed and paid for, and the Secretary was enabled with the proceeds, together with the receipts from customs and internal revenues and the use to a limited extent of other means at his disposal, to pay every requisition upon the Treasury and every matured national obligation. As evidence of the necessity that existed for prompt action in the negotiation of this loan and the straits to which the Treasury was reduced, it will be remembered by those who examined carefully the monthly statements of the Department that although during the month of April upward of one hundred million dollars had been received from the sale of seven-thirty notes, the unpaid requisitions at it close had increased to $120,470,000, while the cash (coin and currency) in all the public depositories amounted to only $16,835,800. If few men intrusted with the management of the finances of a great nation were ever in a position so embarrassing and trying as was that of the Secretary of the United States Treasury in the months of April and May, 1865, none certainly were ever so happily and promptly relieved. The Secretary refers to this period of his administration of the Department with pleasure, because the success of this loan was to him not only a surprise and a relief, but because it indicated the resources of the country and gave him the needed courage for the performance of the great work that was before him.

HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Between the 1st days of April and September, 1865, the Secretary used his authority to issue securities as follows:

Bonds under the act of February 25, 1862.....	$4,023,000 00
Bonds under the act of June 30, 1864, Compound-interest notes, act June 30, 1864.....	6,000,000 00
24,978,390 00
Certificates for temporary loans, act June 30, 1864.....	54,606,384 87
Fractional currency, act June 30, 1864, Seven-thirty notes, March 3, 1865.....	2,090,648 44
	529,187,200 00
	$620,976,223 31

On the 31st of August, 1865, the public debt reached the highest point, and was made up of the following items, to wit:

Funded debt.....	$1,109,563,191 89
Matured debt.....	1,503,020 00
Temporary loans.....	107,148,713 16
Certificates of indebtedness.....	85,003,000 00
Five per cent. legal-tender notes.....	33,954,230 00
Compound-interest legal-tender notes.....	217,024,160 00
Seven-thirty notes.....	830,000,000 00
United States notes (legal tenders).....	433,160,560 00
Fractional currency.....	26,344,742 51
Suspended requisitions uncalled for.....	2,111,000 00
Total.....	2,845,907,626 56
Deduct cash in Treasury.....	88,218,055 13
Balance.....	$2,757,689,571 43

Of these obligations, it will be noticed, $684,138,959 were a legal tender, to wit:

United States notes.....	$433,160,560 00
Five per cent. notes.....	33,954,230 00

Total.....	$684,138,959 00

A very large portion of which are in circulation as currency.

The temporary loans were payable in thirty days from the time of deposit, after a notice of ten days.

The five per cent. notes were payable in lawful money, in one and two years from December 1, 1863.

The compound-interest notes were payable in three years from their respective dates, all becoming due between the 10th day of June, 1867, and the 10th day of October, 1868.

The seven-thirty notes were payable, in about equal proportions, in August, 1867, and June and July, 1868, in lawful money, or convertible at maturity, at the pleasure of the holder, into five-twenty bonds.

The certificates of indebtedness would mature at various times between the 31st day of August, 1865, and the 2d day of May, 1867.

During the month of September, 1865, the Army having been reduced nearly to a peace footing, it became apparent that the internal revenues and the receipts from customs would be sufficient to pay all the expenses of the Government and the interest on the public debt, so that thenceforward the efforts of the Secretary were to be turned from borrowing to funding. Besides the United States notes in circulation, there were nearly $1,300,000,000 of debts in the form of interest-bearing notes, temporary loans, and certificates of indebtedness, a portion of which were maturing daily, and all of which, with the exception of the temporary loans, (which, being in the nature of loans on call, might or might not be continued, according to the will of the holders,) must be converted into bonds or paid in money before the 16th of October, 1868. The country had passed through a war unexampled in its expensiveness and sacrifice of lives; it was afflicted with a redundant and depreciated currency; prices of property and the cost of living had advanced correspondingly with the increase of the circulating medium; men, estimating their means by a false standard of value, had become reckless and extravagant in their expenditures and habits; business, in the absence of a staple basis, was unsteady and speculative, and great financial troubles the usual result of expensive wars, seemed to be almost inevitable.

It was under such circumstances that the work of funding the rapidly maturing obligations of the Government and restoring the specie standard was to be commenced. While the latter object could not be brought about until the former had been accomplished, it was highly important that the necessity of an early return to specie payments should never be lost sight of. At the same time it seemed to the Secretary that a return to the true measure of value, however desirable, was not of sufficient importance to justify the adoption of such measures as might prevent funding, and injuriously affect those branches of industry from which revenue was to be derived, much less such measures as might, by exciting alarm, precipitate the disaster which so many anticipated and feared. Thus the condition of the country and the Treasury determined the policy of the Secretary, which has been to convert the interest-bearing notes, temporary loans, &c., into gold-bearing bonds, and to contract the paper circulation by the redemption of United States notes. For the last two years this policy has been steadily but carefully pursued, and the result upon the whole has been satisfactory to the Secretary, and, as he believes, to a large majority of the people. Since the 1st day of September, 1865, the temporary loans, the certificates of indebtedness, and the five per cent. notes have all been paid, (with the exception of small amounts of each not presented for payment,) the compound-interest notes have been reduced from $217,024,160 to $71,875,040, ($11,560,000 having been taken up with three per cent. certificates;) the seven and three-tenth notes from $830,000,000 to $337,978,800; the United States notes, including fractional currency, from $459,505,311 51 to $387,871,477 89; while the cash in the Treasury has been increased from $88,218,055 13 to $133,998,398 02, and the funded debt has been increased $686,584,800. While this has been accomplished there has been no commercial crisis and (outside of the southern States, which are still greatly suffering from the effects of the war and the unsettled state of their industrial interests and political affairs) no considerable financial embarrassment.

In his last report the Secretary remarked that "after a careful survey of the whole field he was of the opinion that specie payments might be resumed, and ought to be resumed, as early as the 1st day of July, 1868, while he indulged the hope that such would be the character of future legislation and such the condition of our productive industry that this most desirable event might be brought about at a still earlier day." These anticipations of the Secretary may not be fully realized. The grain crops of 1866 were barely sufficient for home consumption. The expenses of the War Department, by reason of Indian hostilities and the establishment of military governments in the southern States, have greatly exceeded the estimates. The Government has been defrauded of a large part of the revenue upon distilled spirits, and the condition of the South has been disturbed and unsatisfactory. These facts, and the apprehension created in Europe, and to some extent at home, by the utterances of some of our public men upon the subjects of finance and taxation, that the public faith might not be maintained, may postpone the time when specie payments shall be resumed. But, notwithstanding these unexpected embarrassments, much preliminary work has been done, and there is not, in the opinion of the Secretary, any insuperable difficulty in the way of an early and a permanent restoration of the specie standard. It may not be safe to fix the exact time, but, with favorable crops next year, and with no legislation unfavorable to contraction at this session, it ought not to be delayed beyond the 1st of January, or at the furthest, the 1st of July, 1869. Nothing will be gained, however, by a forced resumption. When the country is in a condition to maintain specie payments they will be restored as a necessary consequence. To such a condition of national prosperity as will insure a permanent restoration of the specie standard the following measures are, in the opinion of the Secretary, important, if not indispensable:

First. The funding or payment of the balance of interest-bearing notes, and a continued contraction of the paper currency.

Second. The maintenance of the public faith in regard to the funded debt.

Third. The restoration of the southern States to their proper relations to the Federal Government.

If this opinion be correct the question of permanent specie payments, involving, as it does, the prosperity of the country, underlies the great questions of currency, taxation, and reconstruction, which are now engaging the attention of the people, and cannot fail to receive the earnest and deliberate attention of Congress. In view of the paramount importance of this great question, the Secretary deems it to be his duty briefly to discuss the measures regarded by him to be necessary for an early and wise disposition of it, even at the risk of a repetition of what he has said in previous communications to Congress.

The measures regarded by him as important, if not indispensable for national prosperity, and as a consequence for a permanent resumption, are:

First. The funding or payment of the balance of interest-bearing notes, and a continued contraction of the paper currency.

By the act of March 2, 1867, the Secretary was authorized and directed to issue three per cent. loan certificates to the amount of $50,000,000, for the purpose of redeeming and retiring compound interest notes; and such certificates, on the 1st instant, had been issued to the amount of $11,560,000, in redemption of the notes becoming due in October and December. The notes still outstanding will be either taken up with certificates or paid at maturity. The seven and three-tenth notes being payable in lawful money or convertible at the option of the holders into five-twenty bonds will be paid or converted according to the terms of the contract. Fortunately all the interest-bearing notes are to be paid or converted within eleven months, and they need not therefore be regarded as a serious impediment to a return to the true standard of value. As to the redemption of these notes, and the manner in which they should be redeemed, there cannot of course be much difference of opinion. It is in regard to a contraction of the currency, and upon which of the two kinds of currency—United States notes or the notes of the national banks—contraction should be brought to bear that a difference of sentiment seems to exist.

In his report to Congress under date of the 4th of December, 1865, the Secretary presented as fully and as clearly as he was able to do his views upon the subject of the currency and the necessity of action for the purpose of bringing about a return to specie payments. The views thus presented by him were approved by the House of Representatives on the 8th of December, 1865, by the adoption of the following resolution, by the decisive vote of 144 to 6:

"Resolved, That this House cordially concurs in the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the necessity of a contraction of the currency, with a view to as early a resumption of specie payments as the business interests of the country will permit; and we hereby pledge cooperative action to this end as speedily as practicable."

Among the views thus emphatically indorsed were the following:

"The right of Congress, at all times, to borrow money and to issue obligations for loans in such form as may be convenient is unquestionable; but their authority to issue obligations for a circulating medium as money, and to make these obligations a legal tender, can only be found in the unwritten law which sanctions whatever the representatives of the people, whose duty it is to maintain the Government against its enemies, may consider in a great emergency necessary to be done. The present legal-tender acts were war measures, and, while the repeal of those provisions which made the United States notes lawful money is not now recommended, the Secretary is of the opinion that they ought not to remain in force one day longer than shall be necessary to enable the people to prepare for a return to the constitutional currency."

The reasons which are sometimes urged in favor of United States notes as a permanent currency are the saving of interest and their perfect safety and uniform value.

The objections to such a policy are, that the paper circulation of the country should be flexible, increasing and decreasing according to the requirements of legitimate business, while, if furnished by the Government, it would be quite likely to be governed by the necessities of the Treasury or the interest of parties rather than the demands of commerce and trade. Besides, a permanent Government currency would be greatly in the way of public economy, and would give to the party in possession of the Government a power which it might be under strong temptation to use for other purposes than the public good—keeping the question of the currency constantly before the people as a political question, than which few things would be more injurious to business.

"While, therefore, the Secretary is of the opinion that the immediate repeal of the legal-tender provisions of the acts referred to would be unwise, as being likely to affect injuriously the legitimate business of the country, upon the prosperity of which depend the welfare of the people and the revenues which are necessary for the maintenance of the national credit, and unjust to the holders of the notes, he is of the opinion that not only these provisions, but the acts also, should be regarded as only temporary, and that the work of retiring the notes which have been issued under them should be commenced without delay, and carefully and persistently continued until all are retired."

"The rapidity with which the Government notes can be withdrawn will depend upon the ability of the Secretary to dispose of securities. The influences of funding upon the money market will sufficiently prevent their too rapid withdrawal. The Secretary, however, believes that a decided movement toward a contraction of the currency is not only a public necessity, but that it will speedily dissipate the apprehension which very generally exists that the effect of such a policy must necessarily be to make money scarce and to diminish the prosperity of the country. It is a well-established fact, which has not escaped the attention of all intelligent observers, that the demand for money increases (by reason of an advance of prices) with the supply, and that this demand is not unfrequently most pressing when the volume of currency is the largest and inflation has reached the culminating point. Money being an unprofitable article to hold, very little is withheld from active use, and in proportion to its increase prices advance; on the other hand, a reduction of it reduces prices, and as prices are reduced the demand for it falls off; so that, paradoxical as it may seem, a diminution of the currency may in fact increase the supply of it."

"Nor need there be any apprehension that a reduction of the currency—unless it be a violent one—will injuriously affect real prosperity. Labor is the great source of national wealth, and industry invariably declines on an inflated currency."

After discussing this subject at considerable length, sustaining his views by a reference to the experience of the country under previous inflations of the currency, the Secretary concludes his remarks as follows:

"Every consideration, therefore, that has been brought to the mind of the Secretary confirms the correctness of the views he has presented. If the business of the country rested upon a stable basis, or if credits could be kept from being still further increased, there would be less occasion for solicitude on this subject. But such is not the fact. Business is not in a healthy condition; it is speculative, feverish, uncertain. Every day that contraction is deferred increases the difficulty of preventing a financial collapse. Prices and credits will not remain as they are. The tide will either recede or advance, and it will not recede without the exercise of the controlling power of Congress."

These views were not only approved by the House of Representatives, but they seemed at the time to be heartily responded to by the people. By the act of April 12, 1866, the Secretary was authorized to receive Treasury notes and other obligations of the Government, whether bearing interest or not, in exchange for bonds, with a proviso that of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 should be canceled within six months from the passage of the act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month. This proviso, while it fixed a limit to the amount of notes which should be retired per month, so far from indicating an abandonment of the policy of contraction, confirmed and established it. To this policy (although for reasons that seemed to him to be judicious the regular monthly reduction has not always been made) the action of the Secretary has been conformed, and the effect of it has been so salutary, and the continuation of it would be so obviously wise, that he would not consider it necessary to say one word in its favor were there not indications that, under the teachings of the advocates of a large and consequently a depreciated currency, such views are being inculcated as, if not corrected, may lead to its abandonment.

Money is simply a medium of exchange and measure of value. As a medium it facilitates exchanges, and by doing this necessarily stimulates production. It does not follow, however, that exchanges are facilitated and production stimulated in proportion to its increase. It is a measure of value, but it does not necessarily create values. It is an indispensable agent in trade between individuals, and in commerce between nations; the great incentive to enterprise and labor in the wide range of human energy and skill; but, great as is its power, and essential as it is to the progress of the race in civilization and refinement, there are limits beyond which its volume cannot be extended without a diminution of its usefulness. A certain amount is required for facilitating exchanges and determining values. The exact amount required cannot of course be accurately determined, but the excess or deficiency of money in a country is always pretty accurately indicated by the condition of its industry and trade. In all countries there is just as much money needed as will encourage enterprise, give employment to labor, and furnish the means for a ready exchange of property, and no more. Whenever the amount in circulation exceeds the amount required for these purposes, the fact will become apparent by a decline of industry, an advance of prices, and a tendency to speculation. Especially will this be the case when an irredeemable currency becomes the standard of value by being made a legal tender. Coin, being the circulating medium of the world, flows from one country to another in obedience to the law of trade, which prevents it from becoming anywhere, for any considerable period, excessive in amount; when this law is not interfered with by legislation, the evils of an excessive currency are corrected by the law itself. An increase of money beyond what is needed for the purposes above named, according to all experience, not only inflates prices, but diminishes labor; and coin, as a consequence, flows from the country in which the excess exists to some other where labor is more active and prices are lower: to flow back again when the loss by one country and the gain by another produce the natural results upon industry and production. Thus coin is not only the regulator of commerce but the great stimulator of industry and enterprise.

The same may be said of a convertible paper currency, which, by being convertible, will not for any considerable period be excessive; but it is rarely if ever true of an inconvertible currency, which is necessarily local, and would not be likely to be inconvertible if it were not excessive, and by being excessive and inconvertible is fluctuating and uncertain in value. The only possible exception to this rule would be found in the limitation of the amount in circulation to what might be absolutely required in the payment and disbursement of the public revenues. No matter what laws may be enacted to give credit and value to it, an irredeemable currency must, unless limited as above stated, always be a depreciated currency. The attempt to give value to paper promises by making them lawful money is not original with the United States. The experiment has been tried by other nations, and generally with the same injurious if not disastrous results. Indeed, with rare exceptions, nations that have commenced the direct issue of paper money have continued to issue it until prevented by its utter worthlessness. There may be no danger that this will be true of the United States; but there will always be ground for apprehension as long as an irredeemable and depreciated currency is not regarded as an evil—an evil to be tolerated only so long as may be necessary to retire it without great derangement of legitimate business. Inconvertible and depreciated lawful money is an agreeable but demoralizing deception. It is agreeable because it is plentiful, and because it deludes by the creation of apparent wealth. It is demoralizing by familiarizing the public mind with dishonored obligations. The prices of most kinds of property in the United States advanced near three fold during the war, but this advance was mainly the result of the increase of the circulating medium, and in reality only indicated its depreciation. The purchasing power of the money in circulation was diminished in the ratio that its volume was increased. The farmer, for example, received three dollars a bushel for his wheat, but, except for the payment of debts, these three dollars were of no more value to him than one dollar was before the suspension of specie payments.

The same was true of other kinds of property and other labor. The advance, except so far as it was the result of an increased demand, was apparent only and unreal. The same cause is sustaining prices at the present time, and will continue to do so as long as the cause exists, but the advantages resulting from it are merely imaginary, while the evils are positive and actual. No sane man supposes that his own wealth, or the wealth of the nation, is increased by the depreciation of the standard by which it is measured. If the paper circulation of the United States should be doubled during the next year, and the prices of property should be likewise doubled, would it be imagined that the real value of property would be thus advanced? Or, if the paper currency should, during the same period, be reduced fifty per cent., and prices of property should decline correspondingly, would it follow that the real value of property would thus decline? In the one case the value of the currency would be reduced in proportion to its increase in amount; in the other the currency would be increased in value as it was diminished in amount. The increase or decrease of prices would, if no counteracting causes intervened, be the natural result of the increase or decrease of the measure of value, while real values remained unchanged.

The United States notes were made a legal tender and lawful money because it was thought that this character was necessary to secure their currency. By reference to the first debates of Congress upon the subject it will be noticed that those who advocated their issue justified themselves on the ground of necessity. No one who spoke in favor of the measure favored it upon principle or hesitated to express his apprehensions that evil consequences might result from it. But the Government was in peril, the emergency was pressing, necessity seemed to sanction a departure from sound principles of finance, if not from the letter of the Constitution, and an inconvertible currency became the lawful money of the country. While the action of Congress, in authorizing the issue of these notes, seemed necessary at the time, and was undoubtedly approved by a large majority of the people, there can now, in the light of experience, be no question that the apprehensions of those who advocated the measure as a necessity were well founded. Had they not been made a legal tender, the amount in circulation would not have been excessive, and the national debt would doubtless have been hundreds of millions of dollars less than it is. The issue would have been stayed before a very large amount had been put in circulation, not because the notes would have been really more depreciated by not being made lawful money, but because their depreciation would have been manifest. By being made lawful money they became the legalized measure of value—a substitute for the precious metals—which, as a consequence, were at once demonetized and converted into articles of traffic. Made by statute a legal tender, they were of course popular with those who had debts to pay or property to sell; costing nothing, and yet seemingly adding to the value of property, supplying the means for speculation and for creating an artificial and a delusive prosperity, it is an evidence of the wisdom of Congress that the issue was stopped before the notes had become ruinously depreciated and the business of the country involved in inextricable difficulties.

But although the issue of these notes was limited, and we thus escaped the disasters which would have overwhelmed the country without such limitation, it can hardly be doubted that the resort to them was a misfortune. If this means of raising money had not been adopted bonds would have undoubtedly been sold at a heavy discount, but the fact that they were thus sold, without debasing the currency, would have induced greater economy in the use of the proceeds, while the discount on the bonds would scarcely have exceeded the actual depreciation of the notes below the coin standard. As long as notes could be issued and bonds could be sold at a premium or at par, for what the statute made money there was a constant temptation to liberal if not unnecessary expenditures. Had the specie standard been maintained and bonds been sold at a discount for real money there would have been an economy in all the branches of the public service which unfortunately was not witnessed, and the country would have escaped the evils resulting from a disregard of the great international law, which no nation can violate with impunity, the one that makes gold and silver the only true measure of value. The financial evils under which the country has been suffering for some years past, to say nothing of the dangers which loom up in the future, are in a great degree to be traced to the direct issues by the Government of an inconvertible currency with the legal attributes of money.

Upon the demoralizing influences of an inconvertible Government currency it is not necessary to enlarge. They are forced upon our attention by every day's observation, and we cannot be blind to them if we would. The Government is virtually repudiating its own obligations by failing to redeem its notes according to their tenor. These notes are payable to bearer on demand in dollars, and not one of them is being so paid. It is not to be expected that a people will be more honest than the Government under which they live, and while the Government of the United States refuses to pay its notes according to their tenor, or at least as long as it fails to make proper effort to do so, it practically teaches to the people the doctrine of repudiation.

The general financial legislation and the administration of the finances during the war reflect the highest credit upon Congress and the distinguished gentlemen then at the head of the Treasury Department. They have commanded the admiration of intelligent and impartial men at home and abroad. In speaking thus plainly of the legal-tender notes, the Secretary must not, therefore, be understood as indulging in the language of criticism. His object is neither to criticize nor to condemn what has been done, but to express his decided conviction of the danger of a repetition or a perpetuation of what experience has shown to have been, in a single but important matter, unfortunate legislation.

If the views thus presented are correct, there can be no question that there is still an excess of paper money in the United States, and that the legal-tender notes are an obstacle, and unless reduced in amount must continue to be an obstacle to a return to a stable currency.

In opposition to these views it is urged by many intelligent persons that as the credit system has been very much curtailed since 1861, and sales are made chiefly for cash, a much larger amount of currency is required than formerly for the convenient transaction of business; that there is in fact no excess of money in the United States, but that on the contrary an increase is required to move the crops, encourage enterprise, and give activity to trade. As an evidence of the correctness of this opinion, reference is made to the "tightness of the money market" in the commercial cities, and the scarcity of money in the agricultural districts.

It is undoubtedly true that the effect of a curtailment of credits would have been to increase the legitimate demand for currency, if no other means had intervened to counteract the effect of it. But such means have intervened. In all the cities and towns throughout the country, checks upon credits in banks, and bills of exchange, have largely taken the place of bank notes. Not a fiftieth part of the business of the large cities is transacted by the actual use of money, and what is true in regard to the business of the chief cities is measurably true in regard to that of towns and villages throughout the country. Everywhere bank credits and bills of exchange perform the offices of currency to a much greater extent than in former years. Except in dealings with the Government, for retail trade, for the payment of labor and taxes, for traveling expenses, the purchase of products at first hand, and for the bankers' reserve, money is hardly a necessity. The increased use of bank checks and bills of exchange counterbalances the increased demand for money resulting from the curtailment of mercantile credits. That money is in demand, and is commanding full rates of interest, is true, but this does not indicate a scarcity of it. The rates of interest in England and France have rarely been as low as within the last four months, and yet for commercial or manufacturing purposes money has not often been so difficult to be obtained. The speculative reaction or overproduction of manufactures, together with apprehensions of political troubles, have caused business to be sluggish and unprofitable, and made capitalists cautious and timid. Thus, in those countries, money was never more plentiful, and yet apparently never more scarce. Its apparent scarcity in the United States is attributable to high prices, to its uncertain value, and to its inactivity.

Money by no means becomes abundant by an increase or scarce by a diminution of its volume. The reverse is more likely to be true, especially when, as is generally the case, high prices are speculative prices, and prevent activity in exchanges. Money is in demand at the present time, not so much to move crops as to hold them—not to bring them at reasonable prices within the reach of consumers, but to withhold them from market until a large advance of prices can be established. Let the great staples of the country come forward and be sold at market prices, at such prices as, while the producer is fairly remunerated, will increase consumption and exports—let capitalists be assured that progress toward a stable basis is to be uninterrupted—and money, now considered scarce, will be found to be abundant. The actual legitimate business of the country is not larger than it was in 1860, when three hundred millions of coin and bank notes were an ample circulating medium, and when an addition of fifty millions would have made it excessive. Throughout a considerable portion of the best grain-growing sections of the United States there has been during the past year great complaint of a scarcity of money, and yet no single article of agricultural product, except wool, was to be sold there for which there was not a purchaser at more than remunerating, if not exorbitant, prices. There was no lack of money in these sections, but a lack of products to exchange for it. The hard times complained of were the consequence of short crops, and not of deficient circulation. To the farmer who had little to sell and much to buy, an increase of the circulation would have been an injury; a curtailment of it a benefit. And yet by men in such circumstances the policy of contraction has met with a condemnation second only to that which it has received at the hands of speculators in stocks.

Next to the stock board of the commercial metropolis, the opposition to the policy of contraction has been most decided in those sections where, by reason of short crops, the people have been less prosperous than heretofore. Unfortunately, in the same sections, the harvest has been again unsatisfactory, and the demand not only for a cessation of contraction but for an increase of paper money, may thus be more pressing than ever. This demand, no matter from what quarter it comes or by what interest sustained, should, in the opinion of the Secretary, be inflexibly resisted by Congress. To increase the volume of paper money for the purpose of giving relief to the country, would be to foster the cause in order to cure the disease. To stay the process of contraction this year will but prepare the way for an increase of circulation the next. Whenever the policy of reducing the paper circulation of the country, with the view of a return to specie payments, shall be abandoned, it is to be apprehended that the demand for an increase will be irresistible, and that the country will plunge into bankruptcy. The specie standard must be sooner or later restored. Whether this shall be accomplished by elevating the currency by lessening its volume, or after lessening its value by increasing its volume, it is for Congress to determine. That this question will be determined promptly and wisely the Secretary is not permitted to doubt. Some progress has been made in the right direction during the past year, but there is still in the United States a plethora of paper money. If this is not so, how happens it that coin commands a premium of some forty per cent. over legal-tender notes?—that a high tariff has proved powerless to prevent excessive importations?—that capitalists hesitate in regard to the uses to which they shall put their surplus means?—that business is speculative and uncertain?—that expenses of living are driving thousands into crime and making dishonesty excusable, while honorable men of limited means are indignantly and justly complaining that they cannot live on incomes that formerly gave them a handsome support? Money may be inactive, but it is not scarce. Its inactivity is in fact the result of its uncertain value. With a circulation that is to-day at a discount of thirty per cent., and which may by a change of policy be increased to sixty per cent. within the next year, with what safety can men engage in enterprises which look into the future, and which are needed to develop the slumbering resources of the country? Let the paper dollar truly represent the dollar in coin. Let men of capital and enterprise feel that the currency has come, or is steadily coming to the "hard-pan" of specie, and there will be a stimulus given to enterprise and labor which will banish all complaints of a scarcity of money.

If, then, it be admitted that the paper circulation is excessive, the question arises why should not the contraction be applied to the notes of the national banks instead of the United States notes, and thus a large saving of interest to the Government be effected? This question has already been answered inferentially, but its importance requires that it shall receive more definite consideration.

Prior to 1863 the banking institutions of the country, with the exception of the Bank of the United States, were created by the States, and were subject to State authority alone. They were State institutions, over which the General Government exercised no control. The right of the States to create and to manage them had been so long conceded that no interference with them by Congress, and no decision of the courts adverse to the constitutionality of their issues were apprehended.

Soon after the commencement of war it became manifest that a system of internal taxation must be adopted for the support of the Government and the maintenance of its credit, and that this would involve the necessity of a national currency of uniform value and undoubted solvency. To meet this necessity (United States notes being then regarded as only a temporary expedient) the national banking system was created, not to destroy the State banks nor injuriously to affect their business, but to furnish through their agency and that of new institutions which might be organized under it a permanent national bank note circulation. Had it been supposed that the object of those who advocated the measure was to bring the State banks under the control of the Federal Government for the purpose of destroying them, or that such would be its effect, it would never have been adopted. No such object was avowed or intended by its friends, and no such effect was anticipated by the banks. With that spirit of patriotism which was so marked a characteristic of the people of the North during the war, the stockholders of the State banks relinquished, at the request of the Government, the greater privileges possessed by them under State laws, and in connection with the new banks organized under the law became efficient aids in negotiating the public loans and sustaining the public credit. To all banking systems under which circulating notes are issued there are grave objections, and if there were none in existence in the United States the Secretary would hesitate to recommend or to indorse even the most perfect that has been devised.

The question now to be considered, however, is not whether banks of issue should be created, but whether the national banking system should be sustained. In the present condition of the country, and in view of the relations that the national banks sustain to the Government (ignoring in this connection the question of good faith) the Secretary has no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that they should be sustained. They are so interwoven with all branches of business, and are so directly connected with the credit of the Government, that they could not be destroyed without precipitating upon the country financial troubles which it is now in no condition to meet. At some more propitious period, when the Union shall have been fully restored, and all the States shall have attained that substantial prosperity which their great resources and the energy of their people must sooner or later secure for them, it may perhaps be wise for Congress to consider whether the national banking system may not be dispensed with. The present is not a favorable time to consider this question. The condition of our political and financial affairs is too critical to justify any action that would compel the national banks, or any considerable number of them, to call in their loans and put their bonds upon the market for the purpose of providing the means of retiring their circulation. Conservative legislation is now indispensable. The public mind is too sensitive, business is too unsteady, and the political future is too uncertain to warrant any financial experiments. Fortunately none are required. The national banking system has accomplished all and more than was anticipated by its advocates. It has furnished a circulation, depreciated it is true, like the United States notes, but solvent beyond question, and current throughout the Union. It has prevented bank note panics and saved note holders from losses. It has aided in regulating domestic exchanges, and furnished the Government with valuable financial agents. Had it not been adopted State banks would have continued, as long as they were tolerated, to furnish the country with bank notes.

In most of the States banks were not required to deposit stock for the security of their notes, and in those States where security was required there was no limit to the amount of bonds that might be deposited, and consequently no limit to the amount of notes that might be put in circulation. In other States there was no security beyond the capitals of the banks, frequently unreal, and the partial liability of stockholders generally deceptive. Who can estimate the extent of the injury which the people and the Government would have sustained if State institutions, without any other restrictions than were enforced by State laws, had been permitted during the war to occupy the field? All having suspended specie payments, and thereby been relieved from the necessity of furnishing evidence of solvency, banks unwisely or dishonestly managed would have stood on a level with those which were managed wisely and honestly. While the latter would have found it difficult to keep their issues within reasonable limits, stimulated as they would have been to issue freely, by the necessities of the Government and the increasing demand for money, which is always the result of an increased supply, the former would have poured out their irredeemable promises until distrust created panic and panic disaster. That the national banking system, with its limited and secured circulation, and its restricted provisions, by superseding the State systems, has prevented a financial crisis, there can be but little doubt. For this it is entitled to credit; and for this and for other reasons suggested it should be sustained until a better system shall be devised, or the country is in a condition to dispense with banks of issue altogether.

The arguments in favor of compelling the banks to retire their notes, and yielding the field to the notes of the Government, are based upon the supposition that if $300,000,000 of United States notes were substituted for the $300,000,000 of national bank notes now in circulation the Government would save some eighteen million dollars in interest which is now a gratuity to the banks. That there would be no such saving, nor any saving, by the proposed substitution is clearly shown by the Comptroller of the Currency in his accompanying report, to which the attention of Congress is especially asked. If an account were opened with the banks, and they were charged with the interest on $300,000,000, and the losses sustained through those that have failed, and credited with the interest on the United States notes held by them as a permanent reserve, the taxes paid by them to the Government and the States, and with a commission covering only what has been saved in transferring and disbursing public money, it would be ascertained that the banks were not debtors to the United States. It is not necessary, however, for the Secretary to dwell on this point, as his main objection to the substitution would not be removed if a saving of interest would be effected by it. Regarding, as he does, the issue of the United States notes in the first instance as having been a misfortune, and their continuance as a circulating medium, unless the volume shall be steadily reduced, as fraught with mischief, the Secretary can conceive of no circumstances that would justify a further issue.

These depreciated but legal-tender notes, notwithstanding the reduction that has taken place, still stand in the way of a return to specie payments; a substitution of them for bank notes would be regarded by him and by the country as a declaration that resumption had been indefinitely postponed. If those now outstanding shall be retired at the rate of only $4,000,000 per month, the amount in actual circulation will soon be so reduced that they may not seriously retard the restoration of the true measure of value. If, on the contrary, under any pretense, or for any purpose whatever, their volume should be increased, especially if they should be made the sole paper circulation of the country, a false measure of value will be continued, speculation will be stimulated, industry will decline, and the great risk be incurred that financial health will only be obtained by a revolution, the effect of which upon the material interests and credit of the country no one can estimate. Such a revolution the Secretary is most anxious to prevent; and he therefore cannot approve the proposition of substituting the notes of the United States for those of the national banks, but recommends that the policy of contraction be continued.

The apprehension that this policy will embarrass healthy trade is in his judgment unfounded. Legitimate business has not suffered by the curtailment which has taken place within the last two years, nor will it permanently suffer by such a contraction, prudently enforced, as may be necessary to bring the precious metals again into circulation. What business requires is a stable currency. What enterprise demands is the assurance that it shall not be balked of its just rewards by an unreliable measure of value. It is frequently urged by those who admit that the currency is redundant, that the country is not now in a condition to bear further contraction; that its growth will soon render contraction unnecessary; that business, if left to itself, will rapidly increase to such an extent as to require the $888,000,000 of United States notes and fractional currency, and the $300,000,000 of bank notes, now outstanding, for its proper and needful accommodation. Nothing can be more fallacious than this unfortunately popular idea. An irredeemable currency is a financial disease which retards growth instead of encouraging it; which stimulates speculation but diminishes labor. A healthy growth is to be secured by the removal of the disease, and not by postponing the proper treatment of it in the expectation that the vigorous constitution of the patient will eventually overcome it.

The next subject to be considered, in connection with the permanent resumption of specie payments, is the maintenance of the public faith, which involves the necessity of wise and stable revenue laws, impartially and rigorously enforced; economy in the public expenditures; and a recognition of the obligation of the Government to pay its bonds in accordance with the understanding under which they were issued.

The remarks of the Secretary in this report upon the subject of the public revenues must necessarily be brief and general. Fortunately the accompanying reports of the commissioners of the revenue are so full and exhaustive as to render any elaborate discussion of this great subject on his part unnecessary.

The power to tax is one of the most important powers exercised by Governments. To tax wisely, so as to raise large revenues without oppressing industry, is one of the most difficult duties ever devolved upon the law-making power. Taxation can never be otherwise than burdensome, and it becomes especially so when subject to frequent changes. It is, therefore, of great importance that revenue laws should be stable. By this it is not meant that they should be unchangeable, but that while, from time to time, they may be modified to meet the changing condition of the country, the principles upon which they are based should be so wise and just as to give to them permanency of character. Perhaps as much mischief has resulted from the frequent changes in the tariff laws of the United States as from their defects. From the time when the first tariff was framed in 1789 up to the last session of Congress the tariff has been a fruitful subject of discussion, and at no period has the policy of the Government in regard to customs duties been regarded as definitely settled. There has been a constant struggle between the advocates and opponents of protection and free trade, the ascendancy generally being with the protectionists. The tariffs of 1816, of 1824, of 1828, 1842, and 1861, were all of a highly protective character. Those of 1833 and 1846 reduced the duties largely, and looked in the direction of free trade. So evenly, however, have parties been divided, that although protective laws have generally been in force, at no period from 1789 to the present day have importers and manufacturers had any reasonable assurances that existing tariff laws might not be suddenly and materially altered. That the effect of these changes—actual and apprehended—has been highly injurious to the country cannot be questioned; that it has not been disastrous indicates the readiness of the people of the United States to adapt their business to the policy of the Government, whatever it may be.

The frequent changes of the tariff laws are attributable to the fact that in none of them has a revenue been the principal object. There has never been in the United States a strictly revenue tariff, and consequently there has been no stability in the tariff laws. Up to 1861 the revenues from customs, under any scale of duties adopted, were sufficient to defray the expenses of the Government, and therefore the question, now so interesting, was hardly a prominent one. In the present financial condition of the country large revenues are indispensable, and in adjusting the present tariff the question of revenue must necessarily be the question of paramount importance.

When the Government was substantially free from debt, and the public expenditures were small, as was the case before the rebellion, a revenue tariff properly adjusted to the public necessities would have been a low tariff. But now, when a heavy debt and liberal expenditures create a necessity for large revenues, a considerable portion of which must, for some years to come, be derived from customs, it is difficult to perceive how, without excessive importations, a strictly revenue tariff can fail to be a high one. It may thus turn out that the necessities of the Government may give incidentally to American manufacturers the protection they are supposed to require without special legislation—always odious and generally unreliable—in their behalf. Inasmuch as large and permanent revenues cannot be realized unless laws are so framed as not to bear heavily upon industrial pursuits, a tariff which, harmonizing with internal taxes, should year by year yield the largest revenues would undoubtedly prove to be the least prejudicial to national growth and prosperity.

A high tariff, by reducing importations, or by oppressing important branches of trade and industry which are subject to internal duties, might prove to be as unfavorable to revenue as a low one, and equally unsuited to the public necessities. The present tariff, although a high one, has not proved to be protective, while for the past two years it has been highly productive of revenue; but its failure to protect those interests for whose benefit it was in a great measure framed, and the large revenues which have been derived from it, do not prove it to be in any just sense a revenue tariff. It has failed to give to American manufacturers the protection it was intended to afford, and it has yielded much larger revenues than were anticipated, because the high prices prevailing in the United States have stimulated importations. It does not follow because it is producing large revenues now that it will continue to do so when business and the currency shall be restored to a healthy condition. The time will soon come when the United States will cease to be the most favorable country to sell in, and when it must pay for what it purchases, not in its bonds but in its own productions. In order that the present tariff should be a revenue tariff, important modifications will be necessary, which cannot be intelligently made until business ceases to be subject to derangement by an irredeemable currency. The Secretary does not, therefore, recommend a complete revision of the tariff at the present session; but there are some features of it, and some matters connected with it, which require early attention.

The experience of the Department discloses many disadvantages attendant upon the collection of duties on imports when the rates are high and estimated on an ad valorem basis. For the collection of such duties, machinery more or less complicated is necessary for the verification abroad of invoices of importations and for the examination and appraisal of merchandise on its arrival in this country. In every instance a comparison is required between the invoice estimate and the general value in the principal markets of the country whence a commodity is exported. The difficulty of ascertaining the foreign market value, especially in cases where a commodity is manufactured expressly for exportation, affords tempting opportunities for successful undervaluation, and the high rates of duty offer inducements for evasion more than commensurate with the risk of detection.

Since the passage of the tariff act of March 2, 1861, the rates of duty which from 1846 to that period were exclusively ad valorem have on many articles been specific. The system of specific duties appears to have given much satisfaction to honorable dealers and to officers of the customs for the ease with which the character and quantity of merchandise imported can be determined; for the uniformity with which duties may be assessed at different ports; and particularly as it precludes the possibility of fraudulent undervaluations. Without recommending an exclusive adoption of specific duties the Secretary would suggest for the consideration of Congress whether the system might not with propriety be extended to all commodities on which the duty bears a large proportion to the value, or of which the foreign market price is subject to great fluctuations, or is from other causes with difficulty ascertained. The special commissioner of the revenue will in his report present the result of his investigations as to the extent to which the ad valorem rates of the present tariff can be advantageously converted into corresponding specific duties.

Our commercial relations with Spain and her colonies under the acts of July 13, 1832, and June 30, 1834, particularly so far as they relate to trade with Cuba and Porto Rico, have been many years the source of much perplexity and have given rise to frequent discussions. The acts above cited were designed as retaliatory measures to induce by a sort of coercion a relaxation of the extreme protective system adopted by Spain in relation to her colonial trade. Not only have they entirely failed to produce the desired effect, but their operation has proved on the contrary positively injurious to our interest in every respect. Their effect, in connection with Spanish exactions, has been to drive the greater part of Cuban and Porto Rican trade from our markets to others where the same policy does not prevail.

The countervailing system thus brings no benefit to our shipping interests and largely curtails our commerce, which, considering the proximity of these islands, should include the greater part of their foreign traffic. It is, therefore, worthy of grave consideration whether sound, enlightened policy does not dictate the repeal at least of the act of 1834.

Recommendations to this effect have been at various times made to Congress by my predecessors, particularly Mr. Walker, in 1849, and in 1852 by Mr. Corwin. The experience of the past fifteen years has fully justified the views then expressed.

The shipping interest of the United States to a great degree prostrated by the war has not revived during the past year. Our ship-yards are, with rare exceptions, inactive. Our surplus products are being chiefly transported to foreign countries in foreign vessels. The Secretary is still forced to admit, in the language of his last report, "that with unequalled facilities for obtaining the materials, and with acknowledged skill in ship-building, with thousands of miles of sea-coast, indented with the finest harbors in the world, with surplus products that require in their transportation a large and increasing tonnage, we can neither profitably build ships nor successfully compete with English ships in the transportation of our own productions."

No change for the better has taken place since that report was made. On the contrary, the indications are that the great ship-building interest of the eastern and middle States has been steadily declining, and that consequently the United States is gradually ceasing to be a great maritime Power. A return to specie payments will do much, but will not be sufficient, to avert this declension and give activity to our ship-yards. The materials which enter into the construction of vessels should be relieved from taxation by means of drawbacks; or if this may be regarded as impracticable, subsidies might be allowed as an offset to taxation. If subsidies are objectionable, then it is recommended that all restrictions upon the registration of foreign-built vessels be removed, so that the people of the United States who cannot profitably build vessels may be permitted to purchase them in the cheapest market. It is certainly unwise to retain upon the statute-books a law restrictive upon commerce when it no longer accomplishes the object for which it was enacted. This subject is one of great interest to the whole country. The attention of Congress is again earnestly called to it.

The special commissioner of the revenue since the adjournment of the Thirty-Ninth Congress has been actively engaged in the wide range of duties assigned to him by law, and, under the direction of the Secretary, has devoted a portion of his time to a personal study and examination of the revenue system and industrial condition of Great Britain and the leading countries of Europe. The result of his investigations will be transmitted to Congress at an early day. In his report the commissioner will discuss the subject of Government expenditures as bearing upon the question of abatement of taxes, the present industrial condition and recent progress of the country, the prices of labor and of raw material at home and abroad, the revision of the internal revenue system both as respects administration and specific taxation, and the relations of the present tariff revenue and domestic industry. This report, and that of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which presents his views in regard to what is needed to relieve the excise from some of its most burdensome features and secure greater efficiency in the administration of the law, will be found to be so able and complete as to make it quite unnecessary, as before suggested, for the Secretary to do more than to commend them to the attention of Congress.

While the amount of revenue to be raised by internal taxes must continue to be large it is evident that many articles now taxable must be relieved from taxation in order that the number of revenue officers may be reduced, duplication of taxes avoided, and the system rendered less obnoxious to tax-payers. It is also evident that the administration of the law must be more efficient than it is at present if the service is to escape utter demoralization. The internal revenues of the past year would have largely exceeded the estimates but for the failure of the revenue officers to collect the taxes upon distilled liquors. The failure is well known to the country, and has been the cause of deep regret and not a little humiliation to the Secretary as well as to the Commissioner.

The duty upon distilled liquors is so high that there has been a temptation to avoid its payment, which has, to a great extent, demoralized both the manufacturers and the officers of the revenue. A tax of two dollars per gallon upon an article which can be made for thirty cents would be a difficult tax to collect even in a small country, where appointments to revenue positions depend upon merit alone, and where dishonesty is promptly and severely punished; it is especially difficult in a country so vast as the United States, where politics are apt to influence, if not to control, selections for office, and where skill in evading the requirements of revenue laws is not among the least decided characteristic of the people. The Secretary is not of the opinion that this tax cannot be collected, but he does not hesitate to say that even if the meter which has been adopted and is intended to be brought into general use shall accomplish what is expected from it, the collection of so heavy a tax with thoroughness will be impossible unless a higher standard of qualification for revenue officers than now exists shall be established. The views of the revenue commissioners on this point are worthy of especial consideration.

The necessity of economy in the public expenditures in the present financial condition of the country is so apparent that no suggestions from the Secretary are needed to impress it upon the attention of Congress. Taxation is weighing heavily upon the people, and they have a right to demand, and they are demanding, that their necessary burdens shall not be increased by unnecessary expenditures. Public economy is, in all nations, a rare virtue, and it is a singular truth that nations which are most deeply in debt, and whose affairs ought, therefore, to be most prudently managed, are the very nations where the least economy is observed. This truth, so interesting and instructive to the people of the United States at the present time, is largely attributable to the well-known facts that the contracting of large public debts is unavoidably attended with imprudent if not reckless expenditures and that when those entrusted with or possessing governing power have once enjoyed the luxury of using or expending freely the moneys under their control (and this is always the case during the progress of expensive wars) proper economy is afterward exceedingly difficult to be enforced. Thus national debts become chronic, and efforts to reduce them are rarely successful. The debts of nations the most heavily burdened, instead of being stationary, or on the increase, might be in the process of rapid extinction if the same economy were practiced now that was practiced before their debts came into existence.

It is of the last importance that the debt of the United States should not, like that of most other nations, be perpetuated by habits formed during the period of its creation. It is large, but fortunately it has not yet become chronic. It was incurred under the pressure of a war so vast and so momentous that economy was in a large degree lost sight of in the absorbing public interest which it excited. It is undeniably formidable in amount, but the experiences of the past two years, during which, under the most unpropitious circumstances, it has been largely diminished, must satisfy the least sanguine that the reduction of it can be continued, and that even with diminished taxation it can be totally extinguished within the present century if a rigid economy, which, perhaps, could not be practiced during the war, and, unfortunately, has not been practiced since, is hereafter faithfully enforced in all branches of the public service. Extravagance in the administration of the Government has not become so fixed as to be beyond correction. There is no substantial difficulty in the way of public economy now, but there may be a few years hence. It is not proper, perhaps, for the Secretary of the Treasury to advise in regard to the precise manner in which this economy shall be enforced, but he ventures to suggest: that the Army, at the earliest practicable moment, be reduced to the minimum required to garrison forts and preserve the peace on the frontiers and along the lines of the Pacific roads; that the expenses of the Navy be reduced, as far as can be done consistently with the protection of our commerce and the maintenance of our reputation as a maritime Power; that retrenchment be introduced into all branches of the civil service; that there be no payments of damages which were the unavoidable incidents of war; that there be no additional grants to railroads, and no considerable donations of any character unless in connection with the appropriation a special tax shall be levied for their payment.

But the public faith does not depend alone upon adequate revenue laws, nor upon economy in the administration of the Government. It rests also upon the observance of contracts in the spirit as well as in the letter. In fact, without this there will be neither efficient administration of revenue laws nor economy in expenditures. Nothing but absolute insolvency will save from the infamy of repudiation a nation that does not pay its debts according to the understanding at the time they were contracted; and when a nation voluntarily violates this understanding it will soon be unable, from the very effect of its own example, to enforce its revenue laws; and its expenditures will only be checked by its inability to collect. How much of the demoralization which exists in the revenue service of the United States is attributable to the failure of the Government to redeem the legal-tender notes according to their tenor, would be an interesting subject of inquiry, but hardly appropriate in a communication like this. In his report for the year 1865 the Secretary used the following language in regard to the national debt:

"The maintenance of public faith is a national necessity. Nations do not and cannot safely accumulate moneys to be used at a future day, and exigencies are constantly occurring in which the richest and most powerful are under the necessity of borrowing. The millennial days, when nations shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning-hooks, and learn war no more, are yet, according to all existing indications, far in the future. Weak and defaulting nations may maintain a nominally independent existence, but it will be by reason of the jealousies rather than the forbearance of stronger Powers. No nation is absolutely safe which is not in a condition to defend itself; nor can it be in this condition, no matter how strong in other respects, without a well-established financial credit. Nations cannot, therefore, afford to be unfaithful to their pecuniary obligations. Credit to them, as to individuals, is money; and money is the war power of the age. But for the unfaltering confidence of the people of the loyal States in the good faith of the Government, the late rebellion would have been a success, and this great nation, so rapidly becoming again harmonious, would have been broken into weak and belligerent fragments.

But the public faith of the United States has higher considerations than these for its support. It rests not only upon the interests of the people but upon their integrity and virtue. The debt of the United States has been created by the people in their successful struggle for undivided and indivisible nationality. It is not a debt imposed upon unwilling subjects by a despotic authority, but one incurred by the people themselves for the preservation of their Government—by the preservation of which those who have been longed together for its overthrow are to be as really benefited as those who have been battling for its maintenance. As it is a debt voluntarily incurred for the common good its burdens will be cheerfully borne by the people, who will not permit them to be permanent."

Now, to what is the United States pledged in regard to the public debt? Is it not that it shall be paid according to the understanding between the Government and the subscribers to its loans at the time the subscriptions were solicited and obtained? And can there be any question in regard to the nature of this understanding? Was it not that, while the interest-bearing notes should be converted into bonds or paid in lawful money, the bonds should be paid, principal as well as interest, in coin? Was not this the understanding of the Congress which passed the loan bills and of the people who furnished the money? Did any member of the House or of the Senate, prior to 1864, in the exhaustive discussions of these bills, ever intimate that the bonds to be issued in accordance with their provisions might be paid, when redeemable, in a depreciated currency? Was there a single subscriber to the five-twenty bonds, or to the seven and three tenth notes, which by their terms were convertible into bonds, who did not believe, and who was not given to understand by the agents of the Government, that both the principal and interest of these bonds were payable in coin? Does any one suppose that the people of the United States, self-sacrificing as they were in the support of the Government, would have sold their stocks, their lands, the products of their farms, of their factories and their shops, and invested the proceeds in five-twenty bonds and seven and three tenth notes, convertible into such bonds, if they had understood that these bonds were to be redeemed after five years from their respective dates in a currency of the value of which they could form no reliable estimate? Would the Secretary of the Treasury, or would Congress, when the fate of the nation was trembling in the balance, and when a failure to raise money for the support of the Federal Army would have been success to the rebellion and ruin to the Union cause, have dared to attempt the experiment of raising money on bonds redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, after five years, in a currency the convertible value of which might not depend upon the solvency of the Government but upon the amount in circulation? No such understanding existed, and fortunately no such experiment was tried. The bonds were negotiated with the definite understanding that they were payable in coin, and the seven and three tenth notes with an equally definite understanding that they were convertible at the option of the holder into bonds of a similar character or payable in lawful money. The contracts were made in good faith on both sides, a part of them when the Government was in imminent peril and needed money to preserve its existence, the balance when its necessities were scarcely less urgent for the payment of its just obligations to contractors and to the gallant men by whom the nation had been saved. Good faith and public honor, which to a nation are of priceless worth, require that these contracts should be complied with in the spirit in which they were made. who understand the character of the people of the United States and the greatness of the national resources ought not to need an assurance that they will be so complied with.

Here remarks upon a subject which it ought not to be necessary to discuss might be closed, but the great interest and alarm excited by the doctrines recently promulgated seem to justify a reference to the debates when the act of February 25, 1862, in some respects the most important of the loan bills, was under consideration, in order that the action and intention of Congress in regard to the legal-tender notes and to the bonds which it authorized the issue of may be understood.

This act authorized an issue of $150,000,000 of United States notes, which were made receivable for all Government dues except duties on imports, and of all claims against the United States except for interest upon bonds and notes, which was to be paid in coin. It also authorized the issue of $500,000,000 of bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after five years from date. The purpose for which these bonds were to be issued was stated to be "to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to fund the Treasury notes and floating debt of the United States," and he was authorized to dispose of them "at the market value thereof, for coin of the United States or for any Treasury notes issued under any former act of Congress, or for the United States notes that might be issued under this act." Regarding only the act itself it is not supposable that Congress intended to provide for funding the floating debt in bonds which might, at the expiration of five years, be called in and paid in the very notes which, with the Treasury notes, were thus to be funded. These bonds, like all others since and previously issued, were intended to be a part of the funded debt of the United States, the right to redeem them after five years having been reserved by the Government, not that they might be called in and paid in a depreciated currency, but in order that bonds bearing a lower rate of interest might be substituted for them, if it should so happen that before their maturity money could be borrowed on more favorable terms.

The act provides that the United States notes of which it authorized the issue shall be receivable in payment "of all claims and demands against the United States, of every kind whatsoever, except interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin." It is not said that they shall not be receivable for the principal of the bonds, for the very obvious reason that they were expected to be but a temporary circulation. A provision that these notes—intended only to meet a temporary emergency—should not be received for the payment of the principal of bonds which were not redeemable for five years, would, if it had been advocated and insisted upon, have been quite likely to have prevented their issue. The public judgment had not then been perverted by an irredeemable currency, and a proposition that indicated a long-continued departure from the specie standard would have found few supporters in Congress or among the people.

But if the intention and understanding of Congress are not sufficiently indicated by the language of the act all doubts must be removed by a reference to the debates while it was under consideration. From these debates it is clear that the issue of the legal-tender notes was expected to be limited to $150,000,000. On this point one of the Representatives from the State of New York spoke as follows:

"Then the whole secret of our financial success lies simply in borrowing $500,000,000, or rather in funding the floating indebtedness convertibly represented by the Treasury notes, so that their issue need never exceed that authorized by this bill, and which is conceded to be the extreme limit consistent with safety to private interest and public credit. Nobody has proposed to rely upon this currency beyond that amount, but, on the contrary, the idea of any further similar issue has been expressly repudiated by every supporter of this bill."

One of the Representatives from Massachusetts put to the distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means the following question:

"Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he now expects, in managing these financial matters, to limit the amount of these notes to $150,000,000. Is that his expectation?"

To which question he received the following reply:

"It is. I expect that is the maximum amount to be issued."

Later in the debate the same distinguished gentleman used the following language:

"When this question was discussed before, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Crittenden] asked me whether it was the intention or expectation of the House to go on and issue more than $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes—a pertinent question, which I saw the full force of at the time. I told him that it was my expectation that no more would be issued by the Government; that they would be received and funded in the twenty-year bonds."

It is clear from these quotations and the whole tenor of the debate that it was the intention of Congress that $150,000,000 should be the limit of the legal-tender circulation; and that it was confidently expected that this circulation would soon be converted into the five-twenty bonds, known as the bonds of 1862, and which are now redeemable according to their tenor. This of itself is a sufficient explanation of the fact that it was deemed unnecessary to provide that these notes should not be receivable for the principal of the bonds. As the amount to be issued was limited to $150,000,000, a provision that they should not be receivable for the principal of $500,000,000 of bonds to be issued under the same act, in which they are expected to be funded, and which were not to be subject to the control of the Government for five years, would certainly have been regarded as being as singular as it would have been unnecessary. But this is not all. The same gentleman, who, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, was the exponent of the views of the House upon this question, in speaking of these bonds remarked as follows:

"A dollar in a miser's safe, unproductive, is a sore disturbance. Where could they invest it? In United States loans at six per cent., redeemable in gold in twenty years—the best and most valuable permanent investment that could be desired."

Would he have regarded these bonds a most valuable permanent investment if he had supposed that they might be redeemed in a depreciated currency at the expiration of five years from date? Again, he said:

"But widows and orphans are interested and in tears lest their estates should be badly invested. I pity no one who has money invested in the United States bonds payable in gold in twenty years, with interest semi-annually."

In these debates very little was said upon the subject of the payment of the principal of the bonds, apparently for the reason that no one supposed that they would or could be paid in anything else than in the heretofore recognized constitutional currency of the country. The same may be said in regard to the debates upon the bills authorizing subsequent issues. The acts of March 3, 1863, and March 3, 1864, are the only acts which state expressly that the bonds to be issued under them shall be payable in coin; and this provision in these acts, if not accidental, attracted no attention at the time, either in Congress or with the public. Under the former act $75,000,000 of twenty-year six per cent. bonds (part of those known as bonds of 1861) were issued, and under the latter act nearly two hundred millions of five per cent. bonds, known as ten-forties; and the fact that these six per cent. bonds have had no higher reputation than other bonds of the same class, and that the five per cent. bonds never were a popular security, and have in the market until very recently scarcely possessed a value corresponding with the six per cent. five-twenties, shows conclusively that dealers in Government securities, and the people generally, have not regarded this provision as placing them on a different footing as to the kind of money in which they are to be paid from the bonds issued under acts containing no such provisions.

There was nothing in the condition of the country when these acts were passed that required an unusual provision in order that the loans authorized by them might be successfully negotiated; on the contrary, the national credit was better then than at periods when other loan bills were passed; nor was there any intimation by any member of Congress, nor was it ever thought by the officers of the Treasury Department, that the bonds authorized by them were of a different character from those issued under other acts. It is unreasonable to suppose that it was the intention of Congress that the bonds authorized by the acts of February 25, 1862, and June 30, 1864, might be paid in legal-tender notes while those authorized by the acts of March 3, 1863, and March 3, 1864, could be paid only in coin. The various issues of bonds, constituting the national funded debt, stand upon the same footing, and all should be paid in coin, if any are so paid.

National debts are subject to the moral law of the nations. Whenever there is no expression to the contrary, coin payments in such obligations are honorably implied. The policy of the Government of the United States in regard to the payment of its debts has been uniform and consistent. Prior to February 25, 1862, there was in the United States no lawful money but specie, consequently its Treasury notes, and its bonds previously issued, were payable in the same currency. Subsequently all interest-bearing notes were made payable in lawful money, but no change was made in the form of the obligation of the bonds. Thus the seven and three tenth notes issued after that date, the five per cent. notes, and the compound-interest notes, were made payable in lawful money, while the bonds not being so made payable have ever been recognized by Congress, by the Treasury Department, and by the people, as payable only in coin. These different classes of securities were negotiated with this distinct understanding—an understanding which is as binding upon the honor of the nation as if it were explicitly stated in the statute.

It is true that the bonds, and notes convertible into bonds issued after the passage of the first legal-tender act, were paid for in a depreciated currency, and were therefore, in fact, sold at a discount; but it is not denied that they were sold fairly, and that every one had ample opportunity to subscribe for them. Agencies were established and subscriptions solicited in every part of the country; and liberal subscriptions were regarded as evidence of loyalty. That they were paid for in a depreciated currency was not the fault of the subscribers. They were sold at the highest price that could be obtained for them—not chiefly to the capitalists of the cities, but to men of moderate means throughout the country, who subscribed for them, not for speculation, but to aid the Government in its struggles with a gigantic rebellion; and it is a significant fact that, with rare exceptions, the complaints that they were sold at a discount come from those who, doubtful of the result of the conflict, declined to invest in them. How would the Government of the United States stand before the world—how would it stand in the estimation of its own people, if it should decline to pay, according to agreement, the money it borrowed when its very existence was in peril, and without which it could not have prosecuted the war, on the ground that the lenders took advantage of its necessities and purchased its securities at less than their value?

But if the honor of the nation were not involved in the question the inquiry arises In what shall the bonds be paid if not in coin?

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

HO. OF REPS.

Some five hundred and fifteen millions of five-twenty bonds are now redeemable according to their tenor. No one, certainly, would propose that some of them shall be called in and paid in a currency now worth seventy cents on the dollar while the rest shall remain unredeemed until the currency shall be more depreciated by additions to its volume or appreciated by contraction. The holders of these bonds stand on the same footing; if any are to be paid before maturity in a depreciated currency the whole should be so paid, and in a currency of equal value. But the Government has no United States notes in the Treasury, and as the annual receipts are not likely hereafter to be much in excess of the expenditures, and as a new loan to raise money for the purpose of violating an agreement under which a previous loan was negotiated would be impracticable, there would be no way in which the bonds now redeemable could be paid as has been proposed except by putting the printing presses again at work and issuing more promises which must themselves eventually be paid in coin, converted into coin bonds, or repudiated. This process of making money seems an easy one, but our own experience and the experience of every other nation that has tried it prove it to be neither judicious nor profitable.

As the paper circulation of the country is already redundant it would be lessened in value by every addition to it, and by the distress thus created its depreciation would doubtless be in a greater ratio even than the additions would bear to the volume to which they would be added. It is not too much to say that an additional issue of $500,000,000 of United States notes would reduce the $700,000,000 of paper money now in circulation to one half their present value; so that a legal-tender note or a national bank note, now worth seventy per cent. in coin, would not be worth more than thirty-five per cent., even if the apprehension of further issues did not place it on a par with confederate notes at the collapse of the rebellion. The bonds would of course decline in value with the currency in which they would be payable. Can any one seriously propose thus to depreciate, if not to render valueless, the money and securities of the people? Can any one, knowing the effect which such an issue would have upon the Government bonds, upon the currency now afloat, upon business, upon credit, upon the public morals, seriously advocate such a measure, not as a matter of necessity, but to anticipate the payment of debts due many years hence? The statement of the proposition exposes its wickedness. When fairly considered it cannot fail to be stamped with universal condemnation. It is a proposition that the people of the United States, who own four fifths of the national obligations, shall, by their own deliberate act, rob and ruin themselves, and at the same time cover the nation with inexpressible and infaceable disgrace.

In opposition to all such expedients for paying, or rather for getting rid of, the public debt, is the upright, world-honored economical policy of paying every obligation of the Government according to the understanding with which it was created—the policy of appreciating the paper dollar until it shall represent a dollar in coin, of giving stability to business and assurance to enterprise, and wiping from the country the reproach that rests upon it by reason of the low price of its securities in the great marts of the world. That this is the policy which will be sustained by the people and their representatives the Secretary has the fullest confidence. There may hereafter be nations which, ignoring their honorary obligations, may look only to their own statutes for the measure of their liabilities. If there shall be such nations the Republic of the United States will not be found among them. It has essentially suffered by the actual repudiation of some of the States and the virtual repudiation of others; it is still suffering from the same cause, although more than a quarter of a century has elapsed since this stigma was fixed upon American credit. It is suffering also from the fact that Massachusetts and California alone, of all the States, have continued to pay the interest on their bonds in coin. But although it has suffered, and is still suffering, from the bad faith or false economy of some of its members, its own financial honor is unsullied. It has committed the mistake of making its inconvertible promises a legal tender, but it has never taken advantage of its own legislation to lessen in the hands of the holders the value of its securities or violate its engagements by covert repudiation. In the darkest hours of the rebellion it faltered not in the observance of its contracts. Shall it falter now when its ability to pay to the uttermost farthing, even without oppressive taxation, cannot be questioned?

The importance of the restoration of the southern States to their proper relations with the Federal Government cannot be overestimated. A curtailment of the currency and a maintenance of the public faith are not all that is required to restore the country to perfect financial health. We need in addition to these a united country—united in fact as well as in name. It may not be proper for the Secretary in this report to discuss the measures regarded by him as best calculated to bring about this most desirable result. This, however, he feels it to be his duty to say, as he substantially said in his last year's report, that the question of reconstruction as a purely financial question is in his judgment second in importance to none that Congress will ever be called upon to consider. The great staples of the South have for many years constituted a large portion of our exports. But for the cotton held in that section at the close of the rebellion the foreign exchanges would have been so largely against the United States that a commercial revulsion would have been imminent, if not unavoidable. Even in the deplorable condition of these States last year more than two thirds of our exports consisted of their productions, and it is the crop of the present year—small though it may be—that is to save us from ruinous indebtedness to Europe. It is of the greatest moment, therefore, that the productive power of the southern States should be restored as rapidly as possible. Little progress has been made in this direction during the past two years, and no real progress will be made until their political condition is determined by their restoration to the Union with all the rights and privileges of other States under the Constitution. The Secretary does not allude to this subject for the purpose of calling the attention of Congress to it. This is unnecessary. It is absorbing the public attention, and the further action of Congress in relation to it will be watched by the people with intense solicitude. Upon the judicious settlement of it depends in a great degree the national prosperity. The views presented by the Secretary upon this subject in his last report are equally appropriate at the present time.

In his report for the year 1865 the Secretary used the following language in regard to taxation by the States of Government obligations:

"In view of the fact that the exemption of Government securities from State taxation is by many persons considered an unjust discrimination in their favor, efforts may be made to induce Congress to legislate upon the subject of their taxation. Of course the existing exemption from State and municipal taxation of bonds and securities now outstanding will be scrupulously regarded. That exemption is a part of the contract under which the securities have been issued and the money loaned thereon to the Government, and it would not only be unconstitutional but a breach of the public faith of the nation to disregard it. It would also, in the judgment of the Secretary, be unwise for Congress to grant to the States the power, which they will not possess unless conferred by express congressional enactment, of imposing taxes upon securities of the United States which may be hereafter issued. Such taxation, in any form, would result in serious, if not fatal, embarassment to the Government and, instead of relieving, would eventually injure the great mass of the people, who are to bear their full proportion of the burden of the public debt. This is a subject in relation to which there should be no difference of opinion. Every tax-payer is personally interested in having the public debt placed at home, and at a low rate of interest, which cannot be done if the public securities are to be subject to local taxation.

"Taxes vary largely in different States, and in different counties and cities of the same State, and are everywhere so high that, unless protected against them, the bonds into which the present debt must be funded cannot be distributed among the people, except in some favored localities, unless they bear a rate of interest so high as to make the debt severely oppressive, and to render the prospect of its extinguishment well-nigh hopeless. Exempted from local taxation, the debt can, it is expected, be funded at an early day at five per cent.; if local taxation is allowed, no considerable portion of the debt which falls due within the next four years can be funded at home at less than eight per cent. The tax-payers of the United States cannot afford to have their burdens thus increased. It is also evident that the relief which local-tax payers would obtain from Government taxation, as the result of a low rate of interest on the national securities, would at least be as great as the increase of local taxes to which they would be subjected on account of the exemption of Government securities; while if those securities should bear a rate of interest sufficient to secure their sale when subject to local taxes, how, if any of them, would long remain where those taxes could reach them. They would be rapidly transferred to other countries, into the hands of foreign capitalists, and thus at last the burdens of paying a high rate of interest would be left upon the people of this country without compensation or alleviation."

The views of the Secretary, thus expressed, have undergone no change, but the exemption from taxation of any kind of property, by which special privileges are, or seem to be, granted to any class of citizens, is odious to the heavily-burdened masses in all countries, and is especially so in a Republic like ours. Local taxes in all the States are heavy, and no matter what the law may say upon the subject, no matter what the contract may have been under which they were negotiated, there is a general sentiment among tax-payers that the exemption of Government bonds from local taxation is not exactly right, and that it ought to be in some way avoided in future issues. The Secretary has no hesitation in admitting that he is in sympathy with this sentiment. The difficulty in the way, however, as has been suggested, arises from the fact that if bonds hereafter to be issued were to be subject to local taxation very few would be held where taxes are high, and there would be a constant tendency to a concentration of them in States and counties and cities where taxes are low, or in foreign countries, where they would escape taxation altogether. It is a matter of great importance that the Government bonds should be a desirable investment in all parts of the country, and it is obvious that the States should be in some manner compensated for the right now denied of taxing them as other kinds of property are taxed.

After giving the subject careful consideration the Secretary can suggest no better way of doing it than by an issue of bonds to be known as the Consolidated Debt of the United States, bearing six per cent. interest, and having twenty years to run, into which all other obligations of the Government shall as rapidly as possible be converted; one sixth part of the interest at each semi-annual payment to be reserved by the Government and paid over to the States, according to their population. By this means all the bonds, wherever held, would be taxed alike, and a general distribution of them be secured. State taxes, including the levies for county and municipal purposes, now, as a general thing, exceed one per cent., but when the debts incurred for the payment of bounties are paid (and in most of the States they are already in the process of rapid extinction) and economy is again practiced in the administration of State affairs, this indirect assessment will be quite likely to equal the tax assessed upon other property. If the debt to be funded shall amount to $2,000,000,000, the amount to be reserved and paid to the States annually would be $20,000,000, which would give to each of the $20,000,000 00

The advantages to be derived from this plan are so obvious as not to require discussion. It would secure, as has been already stated, such a distribution of the bonds throughout the States and counties and cities as could not be expected if local taxes should be imposed upon them. It would create an interest in the bonds in States the people of which are justly responsible for the debt, but whose early and complete restoration to the Union is so desirable and important, and would give to them needed aid in their efforts to build up again their own prostrate credit. It would put an end to all discussions and doubts in regard to the kind of currency in which the bonds are to be paid, to all complaints of exclusive privileges, and place the public credit on a basis worthy a nation whose resources, young as it is, are second to those of no other nation, and of whose future resources the present are but an indication.

The bonds, the issue of which is thus recommended, would be six per cents to the Government and five per cents to the holders, which is as low a rate of interest as can be expected to prevail in the United States for many years to come. Of the practicability of converting the outstanding obligations of the Government into this consolidated debt at an early day, at no considerable expense, the Secretary entertains no doubt.

It is therefore respectfully recommended that the act of March 3, 1865, be so amended as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue six per cent. gold-bearing bonds, to be known as the Consolidated Debt of the United States, having twenty years to run and redeemable, if it may be thought advisable, at an earlier day, to be exchanged at par for any and all other obligations of the Government—one sixth part of the interest on which, in lieu of all other taxes, at each semi-annual payment, shall be reserved by the Government and paid over to the States according to population.

The Secretary estimates that the receipts and expenditures for the three quarters ending June 30, 1868, will be as follows:

Receipts from customs.....	$115,300,000 00
Lands.....	700,000 00
Internal revenue.....	155,000,000 00
Miscellaneous sources.....	25,000,000 00

296,000,000 00

The expenditures for the same period, according to his estimates, will be—

For the civil service.....	$37,000,000 00
For pensions and Indians.....	22,000,000 00
For the War Department, including $24,500,000 for bounties.....	100,000,000 00
For the Navy Department.....	22,000,000 00
For the interest on the public debt.....	114,000,000 00

295,000,000 00

Leaving a surplus of estimated receipts over estimated expenditures of.....$1,000,000 00

The receipts and expenditures for the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1869, are estimated as follows:

Receipts from customs.....	$145,000,000 00
Internal revenue.....	205,000,000 00
Lands.....	1,000,000 00
Miscellaneous sources.....	30,000,000 00

381,000,000 00

The expenditures for the same period are estimated as follows:

For the civil service.....	$51,000,000 00
For pensions and Indians.....	35,000,000 00
For the War Department, including $25,500,000 for bounties.....	120,000,000 00
For the Navy Department.....	36,000,000 00
For the interest on the public debt.....	130,000,000 00

372,000,000 00

Leaving a surplus of estimated receipts over estimated expenditures of.....$9,000,000 00

The foregoing estimates are made on the general average of the receipts and expenditures for the past nine months. The Secretary is hopeful, however, that Congress will take measures to largely reduce expenditures in all branches of the service, so that a steady reduction of the debt may be continued.

In regard to the national debt, and the necessity of commencing at once the payment of it, the Secretary, in his report of 1865, remarked:

"We need not be anxious that future generations shall share the burden with us. Wars are not at an end, and posterity will have enough to do to take care of the debts of their own creation."

"In a matter of so great importance as this, experiments are out of place. The plain, beaten path of experience is the only safe one to tread."

"It is of the greatest importance in the management of a matter of so surpassing interest that the right start should be made. Nothing but revenue will sustain the national credit, and nothing less than a fixed policy for the reduction of the public debt will be likely to prevent its increase."

The right start in the direction suggested has been made. Since the 1st day of September, 1865, the debt has been reduced $266,185,121 43. Now, if such a reduction could be made while the industry of one third part of the country, by reason of the war and the unsettled state of its political affairs, has been exceedingly depressed, and the other two thirds have by no means exerted their full productive power; if such a reduction could be made, notwithstanding the liberal miscellaneous appropriations by Congress, the payment of bounties, and the great expense of maintaining large military forces upon the frontier and in the southern States, can there be any good reason why the reduction, so successfully commenced under the most inauspicious circumstances, should not be continued steadily and without interruption until every dollar of it is extinguished? The Secretary indulges the hope that the policy which has been inaugurated, and which, in his judgment, is so essential to the national credit, if not to the preservation of republican institutions, will not be abandoned. Old debts are hard debts to pay. The longer they are continued the more odious do they become. If the present generation should throw the burden of this debt upon the next it will be quite likely to be handed down from one generation to another—a perpetual, if not a constantly increasing burden upon the people. Our country is full of enterprise and resources. The debt will be lightened every year with great rapidity by the increase of wealth and population. With a proper reduction in the expenses of the Government, and with a revenue system adapted to the industry of the country and not oppressing it, the debt may be paid before the expiration of the present century. The wisdom of a policy which shall bring about such a result is vindicated in advance by the history of nations whose people are burdened with inherited debts, and with no prospect of relief for themselves or their posterity. In the appendix to this report there will be found a table prepared by a very intelligent gentleman of Massachusetts, which shows how soon the debt may be paid by the regular increase of population alone, at the rate of three per cent. per annum on a regular annual per capita tax of $8 00, which is now much below the present rate.

By a resolution approved February 22, 1867, the provisions of the joint resolution to provide for codifying the laws relating to customs, approved July 26, 1866, were continued in force until the 1st day of January in the year 1868.

Under the authority and direction of these resolutions the Department has caused to be prepared the draft of an act embracing all provisions deemed necessary for regulating the foreign and coasting trade, the assessment and collection of duties on goods imported from foreign countries, and for consolidating and perfecting the navigation laws. This draft was transmitted to the House of Representatives on the 8th of March last, and the report accompanying it gives a general view of its scope, and an outline of the most important changes in existing laws proposed to be made.

The laws relating to the foreign and coasting trade and the collection of the revenue from customs are now dispersed through many volumes of statutes, and have been so frequently modified by amendments of their original provisions that on many points it is difficult for merchants as well as for the officers whose duty it is to construe and execute them to determine what is the law in force.

It is of great importance that laws regulating interests so various and vast should be so systematized that the rights and duties of the classes whose interest are most directly affected by them may be clearly apparent. Their present complication is a source of serious embarrassment to the mercantile community, and it is not less embarrassing to the officers of the customs, whose positions demand prompt action and an intelligent application of law to facts as they arise. The Department has endeavored to obviate these embarrassments, as far as practicable, by regulations and instructions; but these measures are only a partial remedy, and fall far short of supplying the want of a uniform and consistent code. In view of these considerations, it is hoped that the proposed act will receive the early attention of Congress.

The Secretary respectfully recommends the reorganization of the accounting offices of the Treasury Department, so as to place this branch of the public service under one responsible head, according to what seems to have been designed in the original organization of the Department, and followed until the increase of business led to the creation of the office of Second Comptroller, and subsequently to that of Commissioner of Customs. There are now three officers controlling the settlement of accounts, each independent of the others, and, as a consequence, the rules and decisions are not uniform where the same or like questions arise. In the judgment of the Secretary the concentration of the accounting offices under one head would secure greater efficiency, as well as greater uniformity of practice, than can be expected under a divided supervision. It is believed, also, that it would be advantageous to relieve the Commissioner of Customs of the duty of settling accounts, and to confine his labors to the supervision of the revenue from customs, now sufficiently large to demand his whole time. It is therefore recommended that the office of Chief Comptroller be created, having general supervision of the accounting officers and appellate jurisdiction from their decisions; to which should be transferred the duty of examining and countersigning warrants on the Treasury, and of collecting debts due the Government, now constituting a part of the duties of the First Comptroller; and that the adjustment of accounts pertaining to the customs be restored to the latter office.

The Secretary also renews the recommendation contained in his last annual report of a reorganization of the bureaus of the Department, and most respectfully and earnestly solicits for it the favorable action of Congress. The compensation now paid is inadequate to the services performed, and simple justice to gentlemen of the ability and character of those employed in the Department requires a liberal addition to their present compensation. Since the rates of compensation now allowed were established, the duties, labors, and responsibilities of the bureaus have been largely increased, and the necessary expenses of living in Washington have been more than doubled.

The report of the Director of the Mint contains the usual information relative to the coinage for the past year.

The total value of the bullion deposited at the Mint and branches during the fiscal year was $41,893,100 76, of which $40,069,200 06 was in gold and $1,823,900 70 in silver. Deducting the redeposit, the amount of actual deposit was $34,537,048 89.

The coinage for the year was, in gold coin, $28,217,187 50; gold bars, $11,621,691 32; silver coin, $986,871; silver bars, $575,823 18; nickel, copper, and bronze coinage, (one, two, three, and five cent pieces,) $1,879,540. Total coinage, $31,083,598 50. Total bars stamped, $12,197,514 50.

The gold deposits of domestic production were, at Philadelphia, $2,418,197 89; at San Francisco, $17,936,169 40; at New York, $10,320,821 55; at Denver, $130,559 70. The silver deposits were, at Philadelphia, $87,399 72; San Francisco, $744,387 48; New York, $274,893 19.

The gold and silver deposits of foreign production were $2,674,619 46.

The amount of gold coined at Philadelphia was $10,072,060 86; at San Francisco, $18,225,000; of silver, at Philadelphia, $357,490 38; at San Francisco, $780,048 54; of bronze and nickel and copper, at Philadelphia, $1,879,540. Total number of pieces struck, 54,110,384.

A valuable site for a branch mint in San Francisco has been purchased during the past year, and an additional appropriation will be required for the purpose of erecting a mint building complete in all its appointments upon the Pacific coast.

The Director of the Mint recommends the opening of the branch mint at New Orleans, upon an economical basis, for the coinage of nickel copper pieces. The branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina, is being repaired and placed in condition for melting and assaying the precious metals. It will be unnecessary ever to execute coinage at Denver or Charlotte, and the branch mints at those points should be converted into assay offices, and thus expenses reduced.

The Director also recommends the repeal of the coinage charge, the tax on bullion, and the redemption of the cent coinage. His remarks upon international coinage, and his suggestions for the protection of gold coins from debasement, are worthy careful consideration.

An appropriation of $10,000 was made by Congress on the 28th of July, 1866, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to collect reliable statistical information concerning the gold and silver mines of the western States and Territories. Under the authority thus conferred upon this Department, Mr. J. Ross Browne was appointed special commissioner for the mineral regions west of the Rocky mountains. His preliminary report was submitted to Congress on the 8th of January, 1867. The districts of New Mexico, Colorado, Montana, Dakota, and Minnesota were assigned to Mr. James W. Taylor, whose report was submitted on the 13th of February, 1867. No detailed information respecting our mineral resources, the nature and extent of the metalliferous veins, the mode and cost of working the mines, or the yield of bullion, had previously appeared in an official form. Little was known of the local rules and regulations or the practical effect of Federal legislation on the subject of the mineral lands. The value of the information contained in these reports has been attested in a marked degree by the public favor with which they have been received throughout the Atlantic and Pacific States. A new and increasing interest has been manifested in the exploration and development of our mineral regions, both east and west of the Rocky mountains.

As stated in letters of the Department, dated January 8 and February 14, 1867, these reports were merely preliminary. Provisions having been made by the appropriation act of March 2, 1867, for a continuance of this service, the special commissioner, Mr. Browne, has been occupied during the present year in a more thorough examination of the mineral districts within his division. He has traveled extensively over the principal mining regions of the Pacific slope, and collected much valuable information. The scope of his investigations, reaching from British Columbia to the Mexican border, was too extensive to admit of a personal visit to each district, and he deemed it expedient to secure the services of an experienced corps of mining engineers and statisticians to aid him in the performance of his duties. Special instructions were given to them in writing, impressing upon them the necessity of caution in the reception of unverified statements from interested parties, and the importance of accuracy and a critical adherence to facts in their own. Through the services of these assistants, who have visited in person nearly all the districts described, he has been enabled to obtain detailed reports on the products, population, and characteristic features of Utah, western Montana, Idaho, Washington Territory, Oregon, Nevada, California, and Arizona. The adjacent foreign territories in which American capital is invested are also briefly noticed. Particular attention is given to the topographical, geological, and mineralogical features of each State and Territory; to the various systems of mining; the cost of labor and production; the yield of bullion and loss in reduction; and incidentally to the climates, facilities for communicating agricultural capabilities, and inducements to immigration, and the investment of capital. An important feature connected with the development of the mining interest is presented in the tabular statements accompanying the report. While the prospect is generally favorable, and the permanency of the mineral deposits attested by indisputable evidence, the laws sustained in the treatment of the ores is represented as a serious drawback to the prosperity of this great interest.

On the Comstock lode, where gold exists chiefly in an uncombined form, the percentage of loss on that metal is comparatively small; but the loss of silver is so great as to suggest the necessity of some means by which the extraordinary drain upon the productive industry of the country may be arrested. With all the improvements derived from seven years' experience, it appears that the average yield of all the ores worked at the present time from the Comstock lode does not exceed sixty-five per cent. of the assay value. The net product this year will probably amount to $17,000,000—showing an actual loss to the country on this single lode of $9,353,846, of which, by a more economical system of working, a large proportion might be saved. In other districts the loss is greater or less, according to the character of the ore and the facilities for its reduction. Assuming our total gold and silver product to be $75,000,000 for the calendar year 1867, it is estimated that the aggregate loss on the production of this amount of bullion does not fall far short of $25,000,000. Indian hostilities and other causes have retarded the progress of the mining interest in Montana, Idaho, Colorado, and Arizona; but under the most favorable circumstances such a drain upon our resources as that to which attention is now called would appear to demand the serious consideration of Government.

The special commissioner recommends, as the only possible remedy, the establishment, at some central point west of the Rocky mountains, of a national mining school, organized upon comprehensive principles, analogous in its general design and scope to the great mining schools of Europe. By the concentration of scientific experience upon the processes of mining and metallurgy, and the analytical and working tests that could be applied to the different ores, where individual enterprise has so long and so signally failed, it is believed the results would be beneficial. Without assuming to suggest by what means this object could be best accomplished the Secretary deems it due to the enterprising pioneers of the West, who have opened up a vast empire to settlement and civilization, that their wishes, as represented by the commissioners, should meet with the most favorable consideration. Whatever can be done to promote their welfare will be a national benefit; and none will question that the tendency of scientific institutions is to strengthen the bonds of interest and sympathy between a people separated by a diversity of pursuits and the circumstances of their geographical position.

An interesting and instructive report by Mr. Taylor upon the situation and prospects of gold and silver mining east of the Rocky mountains, embracing some notice of the Alleghanian and Canadian gold-fields, in addition to the mining statistics of New Mexico, Colorado, and eastern Montana, will also be presented to Congress.

The report from the Light-House Board, with estimates of appropriations for the year commencing July 1, 1868, herewith submitted, is recommended to the favorable consideration of Congress. The progress made in renovating and restoring the aids to navigation so seriously injured during the late war is all that could be expected from the means and time at command. The establishment increases with the opening of new channels to commerce and the rapidly increasing population of the country, and Congress may rely on the judicious application of all means appropriated to that end.

The operations of the Coast Survey have been continued during the past year with accustomed vigor, and progress has been made in all portions of the coast heretofore provided for by appropriations. The estimates for the next fiscal year have been prepared with a view to keeping up the work efficiently on the scale to which it has been developed by the demands of navigation, and accompany this report.

For the collection of the revenue from customs in the territory recently acquired from Russia, until permanent arrangements shall have been made by Congress, a special agent of the Department was dispatched in August last to Sitka, in company with the agent designated by the State Department, to receive the formal transfer of the territory; and for the further protection of the revenue, as well as to obtain information to guide in the establishment of ports and collection districts, the steam-cutter "Lincoln" was ordered to extend her cruising limits to these possessions. An officer of the service, familiar with the coasts, accompanied by several officers of the Coast Survey, was sent from the Department, with detailed instructions, to take charge of the vessel for the cruise. A general reconnaissance of the coast was ordered, including soundings, location of lights, and ascertainment of available channels of commerce. Attention was also especially directed to subjects of scientific inquiry suggested by the Smithsonian Institution.

The steamer sailed late in July, and a full report of her operations is expected within a brief period. When received it will be promptly communicated to Congress, with such information as the Department has been able to collect from other sources, and suggestions as to the creation of collection districts for customs and internal revenue.

The Revenue Marine consists at present of forty-three vessels, comprising twenty-five steamers and eighteen sailing vessels, of which seventeen of the former and sixteen of the latter are employed on the Atlantic coast, two of each description on the Pacific, and six steamers, each of over five hundred tons burden, on the Great Lakes. Five steamers, of three hundred and fifty tons burden and upward, have been sold, in pursuance of the power conferred upon the Department by the act of April 20, 1866, and eight sailing vessels, ranging in burden from one hundred and twenty to two hundred and twenty tons, better suited to the wants of the service, have been constructed. Four of the steamers now in commission are small tugs, employed (two at New York, one at Boston, and one at New Orleans) in a special boarding and inspecting service. These are found to be so serviceable that others like them will be employed, as occasion may require, in place of the larger vessels not so well suited to the service, which will be disposed of as may be found convenient.

The expenses of the service have considerably increased within a few years past, owing not only to the increased number of vessels which the circumstances of our commerce have required and to the consequent employment of additional officers and men, but chiefly to the unprecedented advance in the price of all necessary supplies, and consequent indispensable increase in the pay of officers and men. Since 1861 these supplies have advanced at rates varying from thirty-three to one hundred per cent. All these expenses are now paid from the general customs fund, and are limited in amount only by the direction of the Secretary. They have now attained such a magnitude as to make it desirable that Congress should signify its views in regard to the subject by providing a specific appropriation for them. A bill for that purpose was presented a few months since by the Department which received the approval of one branch of the legislature but did not become a law. The expenses of the service will form distinct items in the regular estimates to be submitted for the coming fiscal year.

The expenses of the Marine Hospital establishment continue quite large, notwithstanding persistent efforts to secure economy. The receipts from the tax are still found insufficient to meet them, and it will be necessary to provide for the deficiency, as heretofore, from the public treasury. It is suggested that, in accordance with the example afforded by the military establishment, authority may be given for the annual appropriation of so much of the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures under the customs laws as may suffice to meet the deficiency unprovided for by the tax.

Efforts for the prevention and detection of smuggling have been actively continued during the year, with considerable success, at a comparatively moderate expense, and without any charge upon the public Treasury, the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures having proved sufficient to sustain the charge and pay into the Treasury a surplus of more than $300,000.

Quite a large amount of stock of private corporations is held by the United States in the custody of the Department, which is a constant source of embarrassment to the Government and to the respective companies. A schedule is annexed exhibiting these stocks and the manner in which they were obtained. It will be observed that they were acquired by subscription under special authority of law in aid of projects of internal improvement. However proper and beneficial such measures may have been at the time of their inception, no good purpose can now be subserved by longer retaining the interests thus acquired, and it is recommended that authority be conferred by law for the sale of them. Such a course, it is believed, will be altogether acceptable to the various corporations.

A portion of the first annual report of the Director of the Bureau of Statistics is submitted herewith, the entire report being in course of preparation for separate publication. It contains a survey of the operations of the bureau; a careful analysis, illustrated by numerous tables, of our commerce during the past year; together with late returns of population, immigration, manufactures, mining, and agriculture. These subjects are particularly interesting at the present time, and the report of the Director cannot fail to attract the attention of Congress and the people.

From the report of the Third Auditor, to which attention is invited, it is apparent that a change should be made in regard to the adjustment and settlement of the war claims that come before his bureau; that a period should be fixed within which claims should be presented, and that measures should be adopted to perpetuate the testimony in cases of claims that are disallowed. Even now, while all the facts are fresh and attainable, fraudulent claims are frequently presented; and when, by a lapse of time, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain testimony in regard to their true character, fraudulent claims will be quite likely to increase in numbers and amounts.

The report of the Treasurer, exhibiting, as it does, the condition of the Treasury and the extent of its operations during the past year, and presenting views upon some interesting matters by an officer of large experience, merits especial attention. The reports of the other bureau officers are also of unusual interest and value.

The work upon the public buildings throughout the country has been prosecuted with unusual energy. It has been the aim of the supervising architect, under the direction of the Secretary, to have all public buildings constructed in the most substantial manner and completed, with a view to economy, as rapidly as possible. The rapidity with which the north wing of the Treasury is approaching completion must be gratifying to Congress.

The Department of State has referred to this Department for consideration the official report of the proceedings of "the international monetary conference" held at Paris in June and July of the present year, and also the report of Mr. Samuel B. Ruggles, the delegate in that conference from the United States of America. This conference was diplomatic in its constitution, having been formally called by the Government of France by official invitations to most of the civilized nations. Its object, as stated by the minister of France at Washington, was a general interchange of views, and also "to seek for a basis for ulterior negotiation" on the subject of a unified coinage for the use of the world. It appears by the official report that the conference, on full deliberation, has agreed on such a basis, which is now transmitted to the different nations for their consideration and decision respectively. The matters thus presented are of high monetary interest to the United States, and merit the attentive and careful examination of its public authorities, executive and legislative. They are fully discussed in the separate report of Mr. Ruggles under the following heads:

1. The composition and character of the conference, embracing nineteen separate nations, with a population of 320,000,000 inhabitants.

2. The importance of including in the proposed monetary reform the nations of Central and South America.

3. The necessity of monetary union between the eastern and western continents.

4. The intermediate position of the two Americas between Western Europe and Eastern Asia, and their duty as the principal producers of the gold of the world.

5. The cost of recoinage required by the proposed unification, with full statistics of the coinage, past and present, of the United States, Great Britain, and France.

6. The probable rate of future product of gold in the United States.

7 and 8. The history of the varying coinages of Europe and their gradual consolidation.

9. The contrast presented by the coinage of the United States, as unified by the Constitution.

10. The necessity of intercontinental monetary conferences of nations. First attempt in the congress at Berlin in 1863.

11. Quadripartite monetary treaty of December, 1865, between France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy, with subsequent adhesion of the Pontifical States and of Greece, partially unifying Europe.

12. The necessity of a single standard exclusively of gold. The fallacy and impossibility of a double standard of gold and silver.

13. A "common denominator," or unit, of gold of defined weight and value, rendering "dollars" and "francs" synonymous or mutually convertible.

14. Action in the conference by the delegates from Great Britain.

15. The consent of France to issue a new gold coin of twenty-five francs to circulate side by side with the half-eagle of the United States and the sovereign of Great Britain when reduced to that value.

The proper examination of a subject so comprehensive can hardly fail to benefit the Government and the people of the United States. In commending the report to the due consideration of Congress the Secretary deems it sufficient for the present to express his full concurrence in the view of public duty embodied in the following extract:

"Let us never forget that the two Americas are Christian members of the great family of nations, and that the unification of money may be close akin to other and higher objects of Christian concord. We cannot wisely or rightfully remain in continental isolation. Integral portions of the mighty organism of modern civilization, let us ever fraternally and promptly take our part in the world-wide works of peace."

Secretary of the Treasury.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Report of the Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
November 26, 1867.

SIR: The revenues of the Department during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1867, were $15,237,026 87, to which should be added amounts drawn from the Treasury under the acts making appropriations for carrying "free mail matter," $900,000, and amounts under the special appropriations for overland mail and marine service between New York and California, $900,000; steamship service between San Francisco, Japan, and China, $41,666 67; and between the United States and Brazil, $250,000, (including $100,000 on account of service performed during the previous fiscal year;) for new mail routes, $150,000; and to supply deficiencies, $1,600,000; making the receipts from all sources $19,978,698 54. The expenditures of all kinds, including the foreign mail transportation, and service for which the above special appropriations were made, say $1,191,666 67, during the same period, were $19,235,483 46, showing an excess of receipts over expenditures of $743,210 08.

The ordinary expenses of the Department, not including mail transportation provided for by special appropriation, were $18,043,816 79; and the ordinary receipts, including the amount drawn under appropriation for carrying free mail matter, were $16,137,026 87, showing an excess of expenditures of $1,906,789 92, which has been met by the unexpended balances of former appropriations. No appropriation for the past year is therefore needed.

The receipts for postages, as compared with the previous year, show an increase of six per cent., and the expenditures an increase of twenty-five and three tenths per cent. The amount of revenue concentrated in the depositories and draft offices was $6,164,728 16; collected by the Auditor, $2,197,118 66; retained by postmasters for compensation and office expenses, $6,314,156 55; and remaining in the hands of postmasters awaiting collection, $561,028 50.

The details of the financial operations of the Department are fully set forth in the accompanying comprehensive report of the Auditor:

POSTAGE STAMPS AND STAMPED ENVELOPES.

During the year 371,599,605 postage stamps, of the value of $11,578,607; 44,566,150 plain stamped envelopes, representing $1,290,688 50; 16,662,750 stamped envelopes bearing printed cards and requests, representing $494,712 50; and 1,857,750 newspaper wrappers, valued at $37,155, were issued. An aggregate value of $13,401,063.

The issue of postage stamps, compared with the previous year shows an increase of about 6.5 per cent., while the issue of stamped envelopes has increased almost sixty-one per cent. This increase is attributable to the introduction of printing business cards and requests for return if not delivered, without additional cost. The issue of this class of envelopes during the year was increased one hundred and six per cent. over that of 1866.

The prediction in last year's report that the use of such envelopes would tend largely to reduce the number of dead letters has been verified. The statistics elsewhere given, under the head of dead letters, show that the number has diminished nearly one million during the past year, and that this gratifying result is attributable to the use of envelopes with a request for the return to the writers of unclaimed letters directly from the post office addressed. It is estimated that fully fifty million of these envelopes were used during the year, the Department supplying about one third of the number. The sales of postage stamps and stamped envelopes during the year amounted to $12,988,134 32, leaving unsold in the hands of postmasters $412,928 78.

New Postage Stamps.

Experiments are in progress with a postage stamp printed on embossed paper, which seems to afford good security against fraud. The fibers of the paper being broken, canceling marks almost necessarily penetrate, so that they cannot easily be removed without destroying the stamp. The adhesive properties are also promoted, and other advantages secured which commend the invention to favorable notice.

The number of packages of postage stamps lost in the mails during the year ending June 30, 1867, was nineteen, representing $3,830. The number of packages of stamped envelopes lost during the same period was seven, valued at $1,191 90.

During the year twenty-eight cases of claims on account of robberies by armed forces have been acted on. Twenty-four of these, amounting to $6,064 05, have been allowed, and four, amounting to $383 27, have been disallowed.

CONTRACTS.

There were in the service of the Department on the 30th June, 1867, 6,376 contractors for the transportation of the mails.

Of mail routes in operation there were 7,743; aggregate length, 203,245 miles; aggregate annual transportation, 78,982,789 miles; aggregate annual cost, $9,336,286; including the compensation of postal railway clerks, route agents, local agents, mail messengers, mail-route messengers, and baggage masters in charge of mails, namely: $1,020,871, the aggregate annual cost was $10,357,157. This service was divided as follows:

Railroad routes: Length, 84,015 miles; annual transportation, 32,437,900 miles; annual cost, $3,812,600; about 11.75 cents per mile.

Steamboat routes: Length, 15,094 miles; annual transportation, 3,210,740 miles; annual cost, $472,206; about 14.7 cents per mile.

Celerity, certainty, and security routes: Length, 153,136 miles; annual transportation, 43,334,149 miles; annual cost, $5,051,480; about 11.65 cents per mile.

The length of routes was increased over the preceding year 22,324 miles; the annual transportation, 7,144,875 miles; and cost $1,705,812; to which add increased cost for railway postal clerks, route, local, and other agents, $241,161, makes an aggregate of $1,946,973.

LEGISLATIVE CONTRACTS.

San Francisco to Portland, by Sea.

By a joint resolution of Congress approved February 18, 1867, the Postmaster General was "authorized to employ ocean mail service between San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, not less than three times a month, in continuation of the service from New York via Panama to San Francisco; provided that the cost of said service shall not exceed $25,000 per annum." The resolution further directed that bids for the service be invited by advertisement in newspapers published at San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon. In compliance with the provisions of this enactment an advertisement was prepared under date of February 25, 1867, and inserted in the newspapers directed, and also in one printed in New York, inviting proposals for service from July 1, 1867, to June 30, 1870. But one bid was received, that of the California, Oregon, and Mexican Steamship Company, at $25,000 per annum, which was accepted June 6, 1867, and contracts have since been executed.

Lincoln to Portland, by Land.

The Fortieth Congress adopted "a resolution to terminate a contract of a member of Congress with the Post Office Department," which was approved by the President March 26, 1867. This resolution authorizes the Postmaster General "to cancel the contract between the United States and the present contractor for the transportation of the mail on route No. 14782, between Lincoln, California, and Portland, Oregon, to take effect September 30, 1867," and directs that the Department "advertise for bids for the performance of the service for the residue of the contract term" in California and Oregon newspapers.

An advertisement was accordingly issued April 4, 1867, and published as directed, inviting proposals for the service from October 1, 1867, to June 30, 1870, under which advertisement bids were received from three persons, the lowest being that of Jesse C. Carr, of San Francisco, at $196,000 per annum, which was accepted August 5, 1867.

The compensation under the contract superseded by this legislation was $179,000.

OVERLAND AND TERRITORIAL MAIL.

No changes have been made in the overland California mail since the last annual report, at which time the Department was having daily service from the ends of the railroad, by both the Smoky Hill and Platte routes, as far as Denver, where the lines united and formed the single daily route via Salt Lake City and Virginia City to the Central Pacific railroad connection.

During the spring and summer months the complaints as to the manner in which the service was being performed, and the great delay in the arrival of mail from the East at Denver and Salt Lake, were more numerous and pressing than at any time since the present route has been in operation. It was charged that the Indian troubles, complained of by the contractor and given by his agents as an excuse for non-performance of service, were a pretense, and that there was no reason why the mails should not be conveyed regularly and within schedule time. The official reports, however, of General Sherman and other officers of the Army, referred by the Secretary of War to this Department, proved conclusively that the most serious troubles did exist on the Plains, and that there was no safety for either passengers or mails except under ample military escort, which could not be furnished daily. A special agent of the Department, lately sent over the route for the express purpose of reporting as to the manner in which the service had been performed during the summer, and also as to its present condition, has under date of November 4, 1867, made his report, which is accompanied by the affidavit of the postmasters at the principal offices on the route, and also by the statements of several officers commanding military stations on the line. The burden of this proof is summed up as well, perhaps, in the affidavit of the postmaster at Denver as in any of the other papers submitted. He says:

"On that portion of the route from Denver to Omaha City, or terminus of railroad, Indian troubles of a serious nature commenced as early as February 16, and, notwithstanding the contractor, supported by the military, put forth every effort in his power to clear the route and keep it open, no mail was received at this office over that route from February 23 to March 2. During the month of March our registers show eighteen failures. From June 8 to September 1 regular trips were made on alternate days, and from that date to the present we have had daily service. I am reliably informed that the delay was, in many instances, caused by loss of stock driven off by hostile Indians, at points where it was impossible to replace it without prolonged delay. This was more especially the case on the route from Denver to Salt Lake City. Late in the winter the Union Pacific railroad was blockaded by snow, followed soon by high water, which caused another delay of three weeks and the diversion of the mail from the Platte to the Smoky Hill line. From the best information I can obtain the causes of all of the detentions and irregularities complained of were unavoidable on the part of the contractor, and of such a character as to have precluded the possibility of any man or set of men making regular trips over the route, unless securely guarded by an armed force of considerable magnitude."

From papers submitted by the contractor to the inspection division it would appear that from April 1 to August 15 the Indians robbed him of three hundred and fifty head of stage stock, burned twelve of his stage stations, with large amounts of grain and hay, destroyed three coaches and express wagons, severely wounded several of his passengers, and killed outright thirteen of his most reliable employees.

The Santa Fé route, although more fortunate than the overland, was also besieged by Indians during the greater part of the summer. Several of the stations were robbed of their stock, which of course seriously delayed the transmission of mail matter. At this date, however, the route is working well, and the registers show that the service is being performed even within the lately shortened schedule time, which gives great satisfaction to the residents of the entire Territory.

A daily mail having been ordered on the route from Salt Lake to the Dalles, Washington Territory, letters and papers from the East for northern Oregon and Washington are distributed so as to be forwarded by that line.

Contracts for the overland and the Dalles routes expire September 30, 1868, and the usual advertisements inviting proposals for the service are about being issued by the Department.

The importance of a mail over the old southern overland route from El Paso, Texas, by Tucson and Yuma, to Los Angeles being urged upon the Department, route 17408, originally let from Mesilla to Tucson, was extended, at pro rata pay, to Los Angeles, and the number of trips increased to three per week. This has proved a source of great benefit to persons living on the line of the route, who had been for five years cut off from any more direct communication with California than by sending their letters by stage fifteen hundred miles to St. Joseph, to be again transmitted two thousand miles by the same conveyance to San Francisco.

With the view of affording more direct mail communication between Chicago, St. Paul, and other important points, and the Territories of Montana, Idaho, and Washington, route No. 13811, from Fort Abercrombie to Helena, was advertised for the spring letting of 1867, and duly awarded to contract, for a three-times-a-week service, to the lowest bidders. By this route, it was claimed, six hundred miles in distance would be saved between Chicago and Helena, as compared with the more indirect one via Salt Lake City. Unfortunately, however, both for the communities interested and the contractors, the Indian hostilities have been so fierce and unrelenting on nearly the whole line, with not even an attempt at military protection, that what little mail matter was trusted to it has been conveyed by ponies, traveling over some portions of the route only at night; and therefore, instead of shortening the time between the points named, it has been more than doubled. The service, as now performed on the route, is of no value to the Department, and unless a marked improvement shall take place by spring it will be discontinued.

RATES OF PAY AND WEIGHTS OF MAILS ON RAILROAD ROUTES.

There are three acts of Congress which contain provisions prescribing the rates of compensation which shall be allowed for the transportation of mails on railroad routes. By the first, approved July 7, 1838, section two, the Postmaster General is authorized to cause the mail to be transported upon "each and every railroad within the limits of the United States which now is, or hereafter may be, made and completed," "provided he can have it done upon reasonable terms, and not paying therefor, in any instance, more than twenty-five per cent. over and above what similar transportation would cost in post coaches." The second, approved January 25, 1839, section one, restricts the authority vested in the Postmaster General by the act above quoted, so as not to permit him to allow more than $300 per mile per annum to any railroad company in the United States for the conveyance of one or more daily mails upon their roads. And the third, approved March 3, 1845, section nine-teen, prescribes that—

"To insure, as far as may be practicable, an equal and just rate of compensation, according to the service performed, among the several railroad companies in the United States for the transportation of the mail, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to arrange and divide the railroad routes, including those in which the service is partly by railroad and partly by steamboats, into three classes, according to the size of the mails, the speed with which they are conveyed, and the importance of the service; and it shall be lawful for him to contract for conveying the mail with any such railroad company, either with or without advertising for such contract. Provided, That for the conveyance of the mail on any railroad of the first class he shall not pay a higher rate of compensation than is now allowed by law; nor for carrying the mail on any railroad of the second class a greater compensation than $100 per mile per annum; nor for carrying the mail on any railroad of the third class a greater compensation than fifty dollars per mile per annum. And in case the Postmaster General shall not be able to conclude a contract for carrying the mail on any such railroad routes at a compensation not exceeding the aforesaid maximum rates, or for what he may deem a reasonable and fair compensation for the service to be performed, it shall be lawful for him to separate the letter mail from the residue of the mail, and to contract, either with or without advertising, for conveying the letter mail over such route by horse express, or otherwise, at the greatest speed that can reasonably be obtained, and also to contract for carrying over such route the residue of the mail, in wagons or otherwise, at a slower rate of speed: Provided, That if one half of the service on any railroad is required to be performed in the night season it shall be lawful for the Postmaster General to pay twenty-five per cent. in addition to the aforesaid maximum rates of allowance: And provided further, That if it shall be found necessary to convey over any railroad route more than two mails daily it shall be lawful for the Postmaster General to pay such additional compensation as he may think just and reasonable, having reference to the service performed and the maximum rate of allowance established by this act."

In order to such an arrangement and classification of railroad routes as the act last mentioned contemplates there is an obvious necessity for accurate and reliable information as to the "size of the mails" they severally convey. Yet, until recently, no measures were ever taken to procure from any considerable proportion of the roads in the service of the Department statements of the amounts of mail matter conveyed by them, respectively. In February and March last, however, a "railroad weight circular" was issued and addressed to the proprietors of each railroad route, requesting them to "weigh all the through mails and way mails" conveyed in both directions to and from every station for thirty consecutive working days, commencing on all roads east of the Rocky mountains on the 1st, and on all roads west on the 15th of April, 1867, and report the results to the Department in a prescribed tabular form annexed to the circular, and to return also a description of the accommodations provided for mails and agents, with the dimensions, fixtures, and furniture of the car or apartment allotted to their use, and a statement of the number of trips per week in each direction. Prompt responses were returned from a majority of the routes; and to obtain returns from the residue a second circular was issued, under date of the 1st August, 1867, notifying them that the returns received would be published, and remarking that roads refusing or failing to respond would incur the imputation of unwillingness to exhibit the amount and character of the service they performed for the Department in comparison with others receiving equal compensation, and that, upon any future call or opportunity for the readjustment of the pay for transporting mails on such roads, the information asked for would be deemed indispensable. The result of these calls appears in the annexed "table showing the weight of mails and accommodations for mails and agents on railroad routes, with the frequency of the service and the rate of pay per mile per annum for mail transportation," in which, it will be observed, the routes are arranged, not by States, but according to the rate of pay, the highest being first, and those of equal pay according to the average weight carried the whole distance.

Two routes receiving the highest rate of pay—$375 per mile per annum—have reported, namely, the New Jersey railroad, route 2006, between New York and New Brunswick, on which the average weight of mails per day carried the whole length of the route is 20,119 pounds, and the Philadelphia and Trenton railroad, route 2067, between New Brunswick and Philadelphia, on which the average weight of mails per day carried the whole length of the route is 20,069 pounds. On four routes receiving pay at the rate of $300 per mile the daily average weights range from 22,581 pounds between Baltimore and Washington, (route 3207,) to 7,668 pounds between Baltimore and Cumberland, (route 3208,) both under contract to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. On eight routes receiving pay at rates ranging from $275 to $210 87 per mile the weights range from 9,385 pounds per day between Cincinnati and Xenia, (Little Miami railroad, route 9406, pay $225,) to 3,518 pounds between Cincinnati and Hamilton, (Cincinnati, Hamilton, and Dayton railroad, route 9405, pay $225.) On fifteen routes receiving $200 per mile the weights range from 19,183 pounds per day between Philadelphia and Pittsburg, (Pennsylvania railroad, route 2201,) to 367 pounds between Syracuse and Rochester, (New York Central railroad, route 1234.) Dividing the Pennsylvania railroad at Harrisburg, the point at which the great mails between New York and the principal cities of the West pass on and off that road, the average weight per day carried the whole distance between Philadelphia and Harrisburg is 8,278 pounds, and between Harrisburg and Pittsburg 23,825 pounds, the largest average reported. On six routes receiving pay at rates ranging from $187 50 to $150 72 the weights range from 4,827 pounds between Boston and Providence, (Boston and Providence railroad, route 608, pay $187 50,) to 1,756 pounds between Chicago and Boonsboro', (Chicago and Northwestern railroad, route 11403, pay $175.) On twenty-seven routes receiving $150 the weights range from 7,384 pounds between Rochester and Niagara Falls, (New York Central railroad, route 1282,) to 287 pounds between Leavenworth and Lawrence, (Union Pacific railroad, route 14,083, branch.)

On twenty routes receiving pay at rates ranging from $145 64 to $103 63 the weights range from 3,603 pounds between Richmond and Petersburg, (Richmond and Petersburg railroad, route 4408, pay $122 45,) to 30 pounds between Rouse's Point and Canada line, (Champlain and St. Lawrence railroad, route 1138, pay $116 60.) On seventy-one routes receiving $100 the weights range from 7,086 pounds between Washington and Lynchburg, (Orange and Alexandria railroad, route 4401,) to six pounds between Shawmut and Shawmut Junction, (Pennsylvania Cannel Coal railroad, route 2380.) On six routes receiving pay at rates ranging from $90 to $77 17 the weights range from 732 pounds between Albany and Junction, (Rensselaer and Saratoga railroad, route 1080, pay $85 75,) to 108 pounds between Canandaigua and Batavia, (New York Central railroad, route 1277, pay $83.) On fifty-one routes receiving $75 the weights range from 2,048 pounds between Atlanta and West Point, (Atlanta and West Point railroad, route 6003,) to 40 pounds between Northboro' and Pratt's station, (Agricultural Branch railroad, route 640a.) On twelve routes receiving pay at rates ranging from $69 09 to $51 12 the weights range from 1,324 pounds between Buffalo and Corning, (Erie railroad, route 1321, pay $60,) or 3,794 pounds dividing the route at Attica, to 46 pounds between Taunton and Middleboro', (Middleboro' and Taunton railroad, route 679, pay $63 16.) On one hundred and eight routes receiving $50 the weights range from 6,488 pounds between Suspension Bridge and Detroit, (Great Western railroad of Canada, route 1320,) to 12 pounds between Washington and Double Wells, (Georgia railroad, route 6005.) On thirty-one routes receiving pay at rates ranging from $47 77 to $20 the weights range from 464 pounds between Lancaster and Middletown, (Pennsylvania railroad, route 2257, pay $45 84,) to 14 pounds between Hodges and Abbeville, (Greenville and Columbia railroad, route 5,607 branch, pay $30.)

In tabular form these results appear as follows:

Not the weight of the mails alone, it is true, but also the accommodations provided for the mails and agents of the Department, the dimensions, fixtures, and furniture of the car or apartment allotted to their use, the frequency of the service, and, it may be, other circumstances besides, are entitled to consideration in adjusting the pay for railroad transportation. Still, the size of the mails being, in the main, undeniably the principal indication or test of "the importance of the service," the figures above cited display great inequalities in the rates actually allowed. No general systematic revision and readjustment of these rates, based upon the returns received, has yet been attempted; but in a number of cases of disagreement between the Department and railroad companies the returns have been used as a guide to a proper settlement of the dispute; and as the terms of existing contracts expire, and it becomes necessary to enter into new engagements, it is expected that such changes will from time to time be made as will eventuate ultimately in the nearest practicable approach to a perfect classification of railroad routes and graduation of their pay according to the comparative value and importance of the service they perform.

The table showing the weight of mails, &c., above referred to, is accompanied by an alphabetical index for easy reference, and also by a list of routes from which no response to the Department's calls has been received, in which list the titles of the companies are arranged in alphabetical order. Several whose titles do not appear in either the table or the list are expected yet to furnish the desired information, they being in correspondence with the Department on the subject.

POST-ROUTE MAPS,

These maps, the general outline of which was suggested by and inaugurated under the administration of Postmaster General Blair, are intended to embrace a systematic exhibit of the postal service of the United States on a plan adapted to keep up with the periodical changes and gradual improvement of the service.

It is needless to do more than refer to the advantages of this graphic mode of representation for a general view of mail connections over the tedious reference to books of entry.

Owing to the vast extent of our national domain, and the great number of post offices and routes to be shown, with the requisite amount of detail, such maps can only be compiled in successive groups of States.

During the past year a map of the mail service in the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, with parts of New York and Maine, has been completed by the topographer, and distributed to postmasters and other agents of the Department, as also to officers in other branches of the public service, and has already secured numerous testimonials to the usefulness of such an official production.

These first demands having been met, copies of the map are for sale from the Department (Second Assistant Postmaster General's bureau) and from agents in Boston, Portland, New York, and Philadelphia.

The next in the series, the map of the State of New York and its immediate connections, is nearly completed by the engraver and will be issued this winter; and the third map, embracing the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and the District of Columbia, being well advanced, will follow soon after.

FINES AND DEDUCTIONS.

The amount of fines imposed and deductions made from the pay of contractors for failures and other delinquencies during the year was $188,839 46, and the amount remitted for the same period was $42,931 79, leaving the net amount of fines and deductions $145,907 97.

MAIL-BAGS, LOCKS, AND KEYS.

A table is annexed showing the number, description, and cost of mail-bags, locks, and keys purchased during the year; the amount expended for mail-bags being $80,440, which, though an excess of $26,812 50 over the expenditure of the previous year, is less by $11,275 86 than that of the year next preceding.

THROUGH MAIL ROUTE BETWEEN WASHINGTON AND NEW ORLEANS.

The through mails between Washington and New Orleans are carried over the Orange and Alexandria railroad between Washington and Lynchburg, Virginia; the Virginia and Tennessee railroad between Lynchburg and Bristol, Tennessee; the East Tennessee and Virginia railroad between Bristol and Knoxville, Tennessee; the East Tennessee and Georgia railroad between Knoxville and Chattanooga, Tennessee; the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad between Chattanooga and Stevenson, Alabama; the Memphis and Charleston railroad between Stevenson and Grand Junction, Tennessee; the Mississippi Central railroad between Grand Junction and Canton, Mississippi; and the New Orleans, Jackson, and Great Northern railroad between Canton and New Orleans. This is called the southwestern route. It is all rail, and its aggregate length is twelve hundred and eighty miles. The Atlantic route, via Richmond, Virginia; Wilmington, North Carolina; Kingsville, South Carolina; Augusta and Atlanta, Georgia; and Montgomery and Mobile, Alabama, is twenty miles shorter, the aggregate distance thereby between Washington and New Orleans being twelve hundred and sixty miles; but on that route there are two hundred and thirty miles of steamboat service, namely, between Washington and Game Point, (Aquia creek,) fifty-six miles, and between Mobile and the lake terminus of the Ponchartrain railroad, one hundred and seventy-four miles.

Records have been kept at New Orleans and Washington since 21st January last, showing the time occupied in the transmission of through mails between the two extremes.

The period from 21st January to 31st October, inclusive, embraces two hundred and eighty-four days; during thirty-five of these days, namely, from the 8th of March to the 11th of April, inclusive, the southwestern route was obstructed by excessive floods in East Tennessee. In the remaining two hundred and forty-nine days there were received at New Orleans from Washington, by the southwestern route, two hundred and forty-eight mails, of which ninety-six were carried through at an average speed of seventy-eight hours and thirteen minutes, a fraction over three and one quarter days; one hundred and four at an average speed of eighty-five hours and fifty-three minutes, a fraction over three and one half days; nine at an average speed of one hundred and two hours and six minutes, a fraction over four and one quarter days; thirty-five at an average speed of one hundred and nine hours and forty-eight minutes, a fraction over four and one half days; one in one hundred and twenty-two hours and forty-five minutes; one in one hundred and twenty-seven hours and forty minutes; one in one hundred and thirty-three hours and forty-five minutes; and one in one hundred and thirty-four hours and forty-five minutes; the common average speed of the two hundred and forty-eight mails being eighty-seven hours and thirty-five minutes, or three days, fifteen hours, and thirty-five minutes. Two trips were made each in seventy-six hours and forty minutes, which was the greatest speed attained. On thirty of the two hundred and forty-nine days no mails were received at New Orleans from Washington, in consequence of the failure of the trains to connect at some point on the route.

During the same two hundred and forty-nine days there were received at Washington from New Orleans two hundred and forty-eight mails, of which one hundred and eighty-seven were carried through at an average speed of eighty-three hours and fifty-three minutes, a fraction under three and one half days; thirty-two at an average speed of ninety-four hours and thirty-seven minutes, a fraction under four days; twenty-two at an average speed of one hundred and seven hours and twenty minutes, a fraction under four and one half days; four at an average speed of one hundred and nineteen hours and fourteen minutes, a fraction under five days; one in one hundred and thirty-one hours and twenty-five minutes; one in one hundred and forty-four hours and fifty minutes; and one in one hundred and fifty-five hours and thirty-eight minutes; the common average speed of the two hundred and forty-eight mails being eighty-eight hours and thirty-nine minutes, or three days, sixteen hours, and thirty-nine minutes. Two trips were made each in eighty-two hours, which was the greatest speed attained going north. On twenty-eight of the two hundred and forty-nine days no mails were received at Washington from New Orleans, in consequence of the failure of the trains to connect at some point on the route.

During the thirty-five days' interruption of the through mail service on the southwestern route the mails were carried from Washington to New Orleans, over the Atlantic route, at an average speed of one hundred and five hours and twenty-six minutes, or four days, nine hours, and twenty-six minutes, nineteen of the thirty-five mails going through each in four days and a fraction over—say ninety-six hours and forty-six minutes. During the same thirty-five days seven mails were carried from New Orleans to Washington, via Nashville, Tennessee, and Cincinnati, Ohio, at an average speed of one hundred and thirty-five hours, or five days and fifteen hours; one trip, the shortest by that route, being made in one hundred and six hours, or four days and ten hours; and twenty-four mails by the Atlantic route at an average speed of one hundred and thirteen hours and twenty-eight minutes, or four days, seventeen hours, and twenty-eight minutes; one trip, the shortest, going north, by that route, being made in one hundred and eleven hours, or four days and fifteen hours.

Compared with the records kept before the rebellion, as condensed in the report of the Postmaster General for the year 1860, (page 23,) the service on the southwestern route exhibits a marked improvement, both with regard to speed and regularity, the average time in each direction being reduced about twenty-two hours, and the proportion of trips performed in schedule time being increased from about one half the whole number then to nearly five sevenths now, reckoning the schedule time at three and a half days until the 15th of June, and at three and a fourth days after that date, going south, and at three and a half days for the whole period going north.

RAILWAY POSTAL SERVICE.

There are now in operation in the United States eighteen railway postal routes, extending in the aggregate over 4,435 miles, upon 879 miles of which twice daily service is performed, making a total equal to 5,314 miles of railway postal service daily each way. There are employed in this service 160 men, as head clerks and clerks, at a cost $187,900 per annum. It would require to perform this same service by route agents, in the ordinary way, eighty-six men, at salaries of $1,080 per annum, the compensation now allowed to route agents on first-class routes, making the cost $92,880 per annum. Thus:

160 postal clerks cost.....	$187,900 00
86 route agents would cost.....	92,880 00

Increased cost of postal clerks over route agents..... $95,020 00

But in making this statement it is proper to state that the reduction of clerical force in distributing and other large post offices incident to the introduction of the railway postal service should be taken into consideration. It is impossible to give the exact number of clerks saved to those offices; but it is certain that in the force of the Chicago, Cairo, St. Joseph, Buffalo, Washington, Richmond, Memphis, and Chattanooga offices an aggregate reduction of thirty men has been made; and it is fair to assume that, without the railway postal service, these same offices instead of decreasing would have increased their force by the addition of at least thirty. The saving may therefore be set down at sixty men at an average compensation of $1,000 per annum each, say $60,000 per annum, thus reducing the balance against the railway postal service as at present in operation and organized to about $35,000 per annum.

The reduction of labor in the New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore offices must, of course, be as much in proportion as the reduction of labor in the offices first mentioned; but leaving out New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and assuming that the railway postal service on these five thousand miles is costing $35,000 per annum, or an average of seven dollars per mile over the ordinary or old route-agent service, the fact that twelve, twenty-four, and often forty-eight hours are saved in the transmission of all the mails passing over these five thousand miles would seem sufficient to justify the increased expenditure.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SERVICE.

At the date of the last annual report Junction City, Kansas, 139 miles west of Wyandotte, and 418 miles west of St. Louis, Missouri, was the farthest point to which a continuous railroad line from the eastern cities toward the Pacific was completed, a gap existing east of Omaha City, Nebraska, in the line from Chicago to Kearney. This gap has since been filled up by the completion of the Chicago and Northwestern railroad to Council Bluffs, Iowa, on the eastern side of the Missouri river, opposite Omaha, and the Union Pacific railroad (the Platte route) has been extended beyond Kearney 329 miles to Cheyenne, at the base of the Rocky mountains, 519 miles west of Omaha, and 1,013 miles west of Chicago, Illinois. The Junction City or Smoky Hill route (Union Pacific railroad, eastern division) has also been extended 153 miles to Hays City, making the length of the railroad route west of St. Louis 571 miles. The mails are carried daily on these routes west from Wyandotte and Omaha, and on the Pacific side the mails are conveyed twice daily between Sacramento and Cisco, a distance of 94 miles, under contract with the Central Pacific Railroad Company. The lines are thus extending east and west to meet each other; the average progress on the Platte route the past year, Sundays excepted, exceeding one mile per day. A continuation of the work with like energy will verify the promise of the railroad companies by the year 1870 to span the continent.

FOREIGN MAIL SERVICE.

Statistics.

The aggregate amount of postage upon the correspondence exchanged with foreign countries was $2,411,242 52, an increase of $152,023 22 over the previous year. Of this amount $1,969,005 55 accrued on the correspondence exchanged in the mails with Great Britain, France, Prussia, Bremen, Hamburg, and Belgium; $348,303 88 on correspondence exchanged with the British North American provinces, and $123,333 09 on mails transmitted to and from the West Indies, Mexico, Central and South America, the Sandwich Islands, Japan, and China. The United States portion of the postage on correspondence exchanged with Great Britain and the Continent of Europe amounted to $871,223 45; with the British North American provinces, $196,848 13; and with the West Indies, &c., $123,333 09, making the total United States postages on foreign mails $1,191,404 67.

The number of letters exchanged with foreign countries (exclusive of the British North American provinces) was 10,298,234, of which 5,312,401 were sent from and 4,985,833 received in the United States. Of this number 9,442,111 were exchanged with European countries, an increase of 877,264 as compared with the previous year. The estimated number exchanged with the British provinces was 2,806,000, making a total of over 13,100,000 letters exchanged in the mails with foreign countries.

The number of newspapers sent to foreign countries (exclusive of the British North American provinces) was 2,956,599, and the number received 1,871,710, making a total of 4,828,482. Of this number 4,418,482 were exchanged with European countries. As no postage accounts are kept with the British provinces the number of newspapers exchanged between the United States and these provinces cannot be stated, even approximately, although it is known to have been large.

The transatlantic steamship lines employed in the service of foreign Governments conveyed mails the postage on which amounted to $1,091,189 55, and those employed in the same service by this Department conveyed mails the postage on which amounted to $878,416.

Ocean Transportation.

The cost of the transatlantic mail steamship service employed by this Department, under the provisions of the law allowing sea and inland postages to American and sea postages only to foreign steamships was $551,338 01. The amount paid for the transportation of mails to and from the West Indies, &c., by steamers receiving different rates of compensation limited to the postages, was $60,711 77, and the amount paid for sea and Isthmus conveyance of mails to and from Central and South America, via Panama, was $22,956 79; making a total expenditure for ocean transportation of $635,006 57, exclusive of the payments made to the Brazil and China lines, receiving subsidies for mail service under special acts of Congress.

Balance due Foreign Post Departments.

The excess of postage collections in the United States on the correspondence exchanged with Great Britain and countries on the Continent of Europe was $564,757 13, and the balance against the United States on adjustment of the international postage accounts with those countries amounted to $357,223 77. Additional particulars of the results of the foreign mail service, which is increasing rapidly in extent and importance, are embraced in the appendix, and also in the report of the Auditor, appended hereto.

Negotiations of new Postal Conventions with Great Britain and Countries on the Continent of Europe.

Following the notice given by the British Government for the termination of the postal convention of 15th December, 1848, between the United States and the United Kingdom, a preliminary basis of a new convention reducing the international letter postage from twenty-four to twelve cents, and establishing moderate charges for sea and territorial transit of correspondence in closed mails was agreed upon between this Department and the British post office, the leading features of which were stated in the last report. As the details of this new convention were yet to be discussed and formally adjusted with the British office, a favorable opportunity was presented to establish enlarged facilities of mail communication with reduced and uniform rates of postage to the Continent of Europe.

With this object in view Hon. John A. Kasson was appointed a special commissioner on behalf of this Department, with instructions to proceed to Europe and negotiate in person at the respective post departments, subject to revision and approval by the Postmaster General, the details of new postal conventions, in conformity with the general basis of international postal intercourse recommended by the Paris conference of 1863—the main points being the reduction of rates on international mail communications, written and printed; the reduction or total abolition of territorial transit charges on correspondence in closed mails; the establishment, as nearly as possible, of uniform postage rates to all parts of Europe; and generally to simplify and render uniform the rules governing the exchange of correspondence with other countries.

Mr. Kasson was selected for this important mission because of his knowledge of postal details obtained during his connection with the Department as First Assistant Postmaster General, and particularly on account of his familiarity with the postal questions to be dealt with, which were fully discussed at the Paris conference, in which he took a prominent part as the delegate from this Department. His success thus far in accomplishing the objects of his mission has been all that I could have reasonably expected, considering the different internal systems and variety of postal interests to be consulted, and the delays encountered in conducting such negotiations.

Liberal postal conventions, with general uniformity of principles and details, have been concluded with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Belgium, Switzerland, the Netherlands, the North German Union, and Italy, securing important reductions of postage, and introducing other valuable improvements in our postal intercourse with those countries. Negotiations are also in progress with the French post department for a similar arrangement, which it is hoped may terminate with like success.

The leading features of the postal convention with the United Kingdom, which goes into full effect on the 1st of January, 1868, are:

1. A reduction of the international letter rate from twenty-four to twelve cents.
2. The standard weight for letters one half ounce in the United Kingdom, or fifteen grammes in the United States, with uniform progression from that basis, one additional rate for each additional weight or fraction of it.
3. Prepayment of letters optional, but unpaid letters to be subject to a fine on delivery.
4. Prepayment of all other postal packets compulsory in the mailing country, at rates to be established by each department, within a prescribed minimum for book packets and samples, and the receiving country to deliver free of charge.
5. The postage collected in each country upon international correspondence, written or printed, to be equally divided, on the principle that every letter receives an answer, and the labors of each office are substantially equal. But each country to collect for its own use the fines imposed on unpaid letters which it receives from the other.

6. The transit charge for letters in closed mails, one half the interior rate in each country, namely, one and a half cents for the United States, and one half of a penny for Great Britain, to be computed by the ounce, or thirty grammes on letters, and by the pound or kilogramme on other mails.

7. Each country to make its own arrangements for the dispatch of mails to the other by well-appointed ships, and to pay for the transportation of the mails which it dispatches.

8. The free transfer of extra territorial mails in the sea-ports of the two countries.

The conventions concluded with Belgium, the Netherlands, the North German Union, Italy, and Switzerland, respectively, contain substantially the same principles and provisions as the convention with the United Kingdom, with such slight modifications as were necessary to meet the peculiarities of the postal system of each country.

The single rate for letters between the United States and Belgium, by closed mails through England, is reduced from twenty-seven to fifteen cents; between the United States and Prussia, embracing all the States now included within the North German Union, the single letter rate is reduced from thirty to fifteen cents; and the same rate of fifteen cents has been established to the Netherlands, Italy, and to Switzerland, respectively, by closed mails through England, thus securing a uniform rate of letter postage to each of these countries.

The conventions with Belgium and the North German Union also establish a reduced international rate of ten cents for letters transmitted by regular lines of mail steamships plying directly between any port of the United States and any port of the north of Europe.

The principle of free transit for correspondence transmitted in closed mails is adopted in the conventions with the Netherlands and Italy, and in each of the other conventions very low transit charges are established.

Copies of these conventions are annexed.

Postal Convention with Hong Kong, China.

A postal convention, with simple provisions avoiding postage accounts, has also been concluded with the colonial Government of Hong Kong, China, a copy of which is annexed. As the colonial post office at Hong Kong exercises exclusive control of all mails received at and dispatched from that port a convention regulating an exchange of correspondence with that office became essential in connection with the United States mail steamship service between San Francisco and Hong Kong. The arrangements made with the Hong Kong office embrace correspondence originating in the United States and addressed to Hong Kong or to the dependent Chinese ports with which Hong Kong maintains postal relations, including Canton, Amoy, Swatow, and Foo-chow; and vice versa of correspondence originating in Hong Kong or the dependent Chinese ports and addressed to the United States. Prepayment is compulsory. Each office retains the postage which it collects at the established rates on the correspondence which it forwards to the other, and the receiving office delivers free of charge.

A corresponding arrangement has been proposed by this Department to the British post office with respect to the correspondence originating in the United States and addressed to the ports in India, regularly served with mails by British contract packets from Hong Kong and vice versa.

Mail Steamship Service to Japan and China.

The mail steamship service between the United States and China, authorized by the act of Congress approved February 17, 1865, was commenced on the 1st of January, 1867, by the departure of the steamship Colorado from San Francisco with the mails for Japan and China, and two additional round trips have been performed between San Francisco, Yokohama, and Hong Kong, by that steamer, departing from San Francisco on 3d of April and 4th of July, and delivering return mails at that port on 15th of June and 15th of September, respectively. The average duration of the three voyages of the Colorado were as follows, namely:

	Days.	Hours.	Min.
From San Francisco to Yokohama.....	22	17	41
From San Francisco to Hong Kong, including detention at Yokohama.....	30	11	10
From Yokohama to Hong Kong.....	6	2	48
From Hong Kong to Yokohama.....	7	12	46
From Yokohama to San Francisco.....	21	9	0
From Hong Kong to San Francisco, including detention at Yokohama.....	30	22	7

The Great Republic and China, built expressly for this service, have been placed upon the line. The Great Republic has just completed her first round voyage, begun at San Francisco September 3, 1867, and ended November 19, 1867, and the China entered on her first voyage from San Francisco on the 14th of October, 1867. The contractors expect to have the Japan, the third steamship building for the line, ready for service about the 1st of July, 1868, and the fourth steamship, not yet named, but now on the stocks in a state of forwardness, will likewise be ready for service in January, 1869. They are unable at present to indicate the time of commencing the full monthly service required by the contract.

A supplemental contract was executed on the 20th of March, 1867, a copy of which is annexed, for the conveyance of the United States mails without additional charge, in lieu of the Honolulu service released, by a branch line of steamers between Yokohama or other port in Japan used by the main line and the port of Shanghai, in China, making continuous regular monthly trips between said ports in connection with the main line, both on the outward and homeward voyages, according to the terms and conditions of the second section of the act of Congress approved February 18, 1867; the branch service to be put into operation in connection with the steamship leaving San Francisco on the 3d of July, 1867, for Yokohama and Hong Kong, and her return.

In April last the contractors applied for permission to perform the mail service between Yokohama and Hong Kong by a monthly branch line of first-class American side-wheel steamships, in regular connection with the main line, under the stipulations of the contract, similar to those authorized by the act of February 18, 1867, for the branch service between Yokohama and Shanghai, representing that it might become necessary, in order to perform the China mail service with the fullest efficiency, to terminate the voyage of the large ships required by the contract at Yokohama, and to employ one or more branch steamships of a like class and description, but less in size only, to do the service between Yokohama and Hong Kong. After full consideration and consultation with the Attorney General upon the question of authority, who was of the opinion that the modification of service desired was within the spirit of the law of February 17, 1865, considered in connection with the amendatory act of February 18, 1867, the permission asked was granted by the Department until Congress shall have legislated further in relation to this service. The steamer New York was dispatched on 3d of August for Hong Kong and Yokohama, via Cape of Good Hope, to be ready to perform the branch service between those two ports, should it be found best to do it in this way, under the permission granted by the Department.

The company have also been authorized to change the Japan port of calling from Yokohama to Osaka, and to carry the transfer into immediate effect if their president, who has gone to Japan and China for the purpose of inspecting and perfecting the service in that quarter, should consider it desirable to make that change in order to increase the efficiency of the mail service, and benefit all interests connected with the establishment of the line.

To carry into successful operation a new steamship line of such extent and national importance it was deemed expedient to employ a mail agent on board of each steamship to receive and take charge of the mails, to attend to their exchange and delivery at all points on the route, and also advise the Department of all irregularities of service, and make such recommendations for promoting its usefulness and efficiency as personal observation would enable them to suggest. Four agents have been appointed and are now employed in this service; two on the main line between San Francisco and Yokohama, one between Yokohama and Hong Kong, and one on the branch line between Yokohama and Shanghai. It was also necessary to employ agents at Kanagawa, Japan, and at Shanghai, China, to receive, deliver, make up, and dispatch the mails conveyed to and from each of those ports; and in the absence of legislation authorizing the establishment of United States postal agencies in connection with this service, or any appropriation to pay salaries of officers and other expenses incident thereto, the United States consul general at Shanghai, and United States consul at Kanagawa were, with the concurrence of the Department of State, designated United States resident mail agents at those ports, respectively, and instructed to act in that capacity in connection with their consular duties, this Department to pay all necessary expenses for clerk hire, &c., incurred in attending to the mails. In respect to Hong Kong no such provision was requisite, as the correspondence conveyed to and from that port was required to pass through the colonial post office.

The establishment of the branch line to Shanghai makes that city the principal distributing point for the correspondence between the United States and China, and the amount of service required to attend to the postal business there will be much larger than at any other port. As our consuls in China and Japan may very well act as postal agents in connection with their other duties, I recommend that authority be given to establish, in connection with the mail steamship service to Japan and China, a general postal agency for China, at Shanghai, with such branch agencies at other ports in China and Japan as may, in the judgment of the Postmaster General, be necessary; and to pay the postal agents appointed and employed at such ports reasonable compensation for their services in addition to the necessary expenses allowed for conducting the postal business.

Mail Steamship Line to the Hawaiian Islands.

The contract for the mail steamship service between the United States and the Hawaiian islands, authorized by act of March 2, 1867, was awarded to the California, Oregon, and Mexico Steamship Company, whose bid for the required service at the sum of $75,000 for the performance of twelve round trips per annum between the port of San Francisco and the port of Honolulu was the only one received under the advertisement inviting proposals for the service. A contract was executed by the company on the 30th July, 1867, a copy of which is annexed. The service was commenced on the 15th October, 1867.

Proposed Steamship Service to Venezuela.

The postal convention between the United States and Venezuela went into operation on the 1st of October, 1866, and the Government of Venezuela has, through its minister, proposed to this Department the establishment of a direct line of mail packets between the two countries, the expense of the service to be divided equally between the two Governments. The propriety of authorizing this Department to unite with Venezuela in establishing such a line on the basis proposed is respectfully referred to the consideration of Congress.

Mail Steamship Service to Brazil.

The United States mail steamship service between New York and Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, has been performed without interruption and with reasonable regularity considering the great length of the route and the delays encountered at some of the intermediate ports, particularly the port of Para, at the mouth of the Amazon, the entrance to which is difficult and dangerous. Para was not originally embraced in this route but was made an additional port of call to accommodate the Government of Brazil which insisted in its acceptance of the proposals of the contractors that the steamer should touch at that port both on the outward and homeward trips, thereby prolonging the voyages to and from Rio de Janeiro about two days, as well as increasing the expense of the service to the United States $80,000 per annum. As the time occupied in calling at Para would be of great value to the respective Governments in expediting the transmission of the mails between the terminal ports and securing important connections at St. Thomas with the inter-colonial mail packets, it is my purpose to urge the Brazilian Government to assent to such a modification of the service as will relieve the through steamers from calling at that port.

APPOINTMENTS.

The number of post offices established during the year, 1,885; number discontinued, 6,111; decrease of offices, 4,226; number of post offices in operation on the 30th June, 1866, including suspended offices in the southern States, 29,889; total number in operation on the 30th June, 1867, 25,163; number of offices subject to appointment by the President, 837; number by the Postmaster General, 21,326; appointments made to fill vacancies by resignation of postmasters, 4,065; by removals, 3,444; by change of names and sites, 135; by death of postmasters, 215; by establishment of new offices, 1,885; total number of appointments, 9,744; number of cases acted upon, 15,960.

A large majority of offices discontinued are in the southern States, the service at which was suspended by order of the Postmaster General in May, 1861, and were not in operation thereafter, but not regularly discontinued. These offices were reported by the Auditor to the appointment office as having failed to make returns for five years, and their discontinuance recommended as necessary to enable that officer to close the accounts of the late postmasters on the books of his office, and for that reason it was deemed advisable to formally discontinue them.

Number of special agents, 43; aggregate compensation, $113,590. Number of postal route clerks, 170; aggregate compensation, $197,500. Number of route agents, 493; aggregate compensation, $485,100. Number of local mail agents, 60; aggregate compensation, $40,358. Number of regular baggage masters, 48; aggregate compensation, $3,320. Number of temporary baggage masters, 56; aggregate compensation, $3,402. Number of mail route messengers, 29; aggregate compensation, $16,050. Total number of employes, 899. Total compensation, $859,330.

Report of the Postmaster General.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

The free delivery of letters by carriers has been in operation during the past year in forty-seven of the principal cities. The number of carriers employed was 943, at an aggregate compensation of $699,934 34.

This mode of delivery continues to grow in public favor, as is shown by the increase of postages on local matter, the reduction of the number of post office boxes, and the large decrease of advertised letters in several of the cities where the system has been more efficiently conducted. Experience, so far, justifies the belief that it will supersede the present system of box delivery, increase correspondence, especially in large cities, and not only pay its expenses, but yield a revenue to the Department.

The postage on local matter in New York amounted to $171,401, the total expenses $151,829 92, showing an excess of $20,071 08 local postage over total expenses.

DEAD LETTERS.

The number of letters consigned to the dead-letter office during the past fiscal year was 8,619,062 dead domestic letters, partly estimated; 443,786 unmailable letters, chiefly held for non-payment of postage; 179,466 dead letters mailed in foreign countries, and 64,194 letters mailed in the United States, and returned as "dead" from the foreign countries to which they were originally addressed; making a total from all sources of 4,306,508—a decrease of 892,097 letters from the same total as estimated for the previous year.

The whole number of lead letters, of domestic and foreign origin, and returned from the local offices of the United States, was 3,798,528, a decrease of 789,514 as compared with the returns of the previous year; the percentage decrease of such as were of domestic origin being about eighteen, while the decrease of such as were of foreign origin was only four and one half per cent.

The whole number of unmailable letters was 443,786, a decrease since last report of 94,337. Of the number received, 7,961 letters were directed to places having no mail service.

The letters received were disposed of according to the regulations governing the classes to which they belonged, as follows:

The number of money letters containing sums of one dollar and upward was 21,365, inclosing $138,365, of which 668, containing $8,564 56, were registered. There were restored to owners 18,577 letters, containing $127,135 43. The remaining letters have been filed, or are held for future disposition.

The number of money letters containing sums less than one dollar was 13,770, inclosing $3,869 24; of these 10,372, containing $3,485 09, were restored to owners.

The amount of money taken from unclaimed letters filed prior to July 1, 1867, was $19,914 67, which, together with $5,159 20 realized from the sale of waste paper, amounting to $25,073 87, was deposited in the Treasury.

The number of letters inclosing bills of exchange, checks, deeds, and other papers, classed as "minor" letters, was 21,262, with a nominal value of $5,109,554 48. Of this class 19,991 letters were restored to owners.

The number of letters inclosing photographs, jewelry, and other articles, classed as "property" letters, was 49,386, of which 34,892 were restored to owners.

The public sale of property belonging to this class realized a net amount of $835 05.

The number of Congressional and official letters returned to the proper Departments was 17,304.

The number of letters containing stamps and articles of small value was 97,059; returned to owners, 88,679.

The number of foreign letters returned unopened to the countries where they originated was 186,189, and the number received from foreign countries was 64,194.

The number of ordinary letters remained to writers was 1,677,875; of these, 1,421,871, or eighty-four per cent., were delivered—fully sustaining the policy of the free return of dead letters to their writers.

It thus appears that of the 4,306,508 letters consigned to the dead-letter office during the year there have been restored to owners 1,611,686; filed and held for future disposition 18,553; and returned to foreign countries 186,189, leaving a balance of 2,490,080 indicative of the number that were property, or unavoidably destroyed. Of these, about 1,500,000 were worthless, being mostly circulars and gift or lottery advertisements; 256,004 were sent out but not delivered, leaving about one million without signatures, or so written as to be unintelligible.

Further details of disposition, and comparative statements of results for the fiscal years 1866 and 1867, are included in the appendix.

During the year, 5,469 written applications for lost letters were received. The number found and forwarded to applicants was 1,110, or about twenty per cent. The registered letters found reached the proportion of nearly ninety per cent., while the proportion for ordinary letters was but five per cent. These results indicate the value of registration, on the one part, and, on the other, that application for letters having no inclosures are useless.

By a resolution of the United States Senate, introduced by Hon. Jacob Collamer, of Vermont, and adopted March 9, 1859, the Postmaster General was requested to include in his next annual report "the number of letters consigned to the dead-letter office during the next fiscal year, and what further legislation is necessary to diminish the number of such letters, or to provide for their return to the writers thereof." Attention was thus drawn to a most interesting branch of the public service, previously almost entirely neglected, while a corresponding interest in the Post Office Department developed in the dead-letter system relations of benefit to all classes of the people scarcely suspected, or at best but poorly appreciated. The results have been eminently satisfactory. The details of postal service have been revised and carefully analyzed in all their bearings upon the transmission and delivery of letters to their address, and also upon the means employed for the return of dead letters to the writers thereof. The improvements which investigation and experiment suggested are too numerous to be included in this report.

Like improvements have been made in the arrangements and labors of the dead-letter office. Statistical records have been amplified, and now cover all important details. The letters received, and their miscellaneous inclosures, have been thoroughly classified. The most approved safeguards of valuable letters have been introduced, and all available measures have been adopted to secure the speedy return to proper owners of all mail matter sent to the Department for final disposition.

Special and constant attention has been given to the reduction of the number of dead letters. In large cities and thickly populated districts improved modes of delivery have been attended with beneficial results; but in general the obstacles in the way of reduction, frequently mentioned in the annual reports since 1859, present difficulties which no official action can remove. These are in substance the migratory habits of our people, the great territorial area over which our mail service extends, and the pertinent fact that fully three fourths of the letters returned as dead become so through circumstances exclusively associated with the parties immediately concerned. "Mistaken direction," "illegible," "removed," "dead," are reasons found on three fourths of the letters tested in this respect by repeated examinations. It is evident that no efforts of the Department can reach such difficulties; and hence it follows that the dead letters from year to year will retain a somewhat uniform proportion to the whole number mailed.

Thus, in 1859 there were 381 dead letters to every $1,000 of postage revenue; in 1861, 339; in 1862, 302; in 1863, 246; in 1864, 301; in 1865, 326; in 1866, 347; and in 1867, 278; showing as the result of eight years of constant effort an improvement of 103 letters to an amount of postage representative of upward of 33,000 letters mailed.

It may be observed that the four years covered by the contests of the late rebellion present smaller proportions of dead letters compared with postage revenues than either the previous or subsequent years of peace. This is doubtless attributable, not to an actual decrease of dead letters, but to the large number of such addressed to soldiers which failed to reach the dead-letter office. These aided in the augmentation of the revenues, but could not be included in the enumeration of dead letters; thus materially affecting proportions based upon such data. But for these the proportions above shown would have been still more uniform.

It has been found impossible to ascertain the statistical results of measures introduced as improvements upon the postal service, because of the want of sufficient data to determine the aggregate of letter correspondence, or the whole number of letters mailed for delivery in the United States from year to year. Efforts are now being made to satisfactorily supply this want. Such approximate estimates as are available have developed agencies operating during the past year which are found to be of prime importance in diminishing the number of dead letters.

The estimated aggregates of letters consigned to the local offices for delivery are 438,846,607 for 1866, and 462,279,719 for 1867, the proportions of dead letters to these aggregates being about one per cent. for 1866, and four fifths of one per cent. for 1867; a gain of one fifth of one per cent., which is also one fifth of the proportion for 1866. On the supposition that the ratio of 1866 was also that of 1867, the letter correspondence of the latter year would have produced 4,669,024 dead letters, an excess of 870,496 over the actual returns.

These results show the presence and effects of agencies operating in 1867 which were not operating in 1866. Unmistakably these agencies are "request envelopes," introduced into more general use during the past fiscal year, and bearing directly upon dead letter returns. It is estimated that fully fifty millions were used during the year, the department supplying about one third of that number, as before stated.

A comparative view of the returns of dead foreign and domestic letters for the same periods sustains this conclusion:

In 1866 the proportion of dead foreign letters to the whole number received for delivery in the United States was three and six tenths per cent. In 1867 the proportion was two and seven tenths per cent., a gain of thirty-six hundredths of one per cent., or one ninth of the ratio of 1866. It thus appears while the domestic element has gained one fifth part of its ratio for the previous year, the foreign element has gained only one ninth part of its ratio for the same year, and hence it follows that in the past fiscal year there were agencies advantageously affecting the domestic reductions, and not affecting the foreign.

The only agencies thus circumstanced are "request envelopes," and in proportion as these are introduced into general use there may be confidently anticipated a like reduction in the number of dead letters, fulfilling the purpose of the laws on this subject, for which this Department and the public are indebted to the foresight of Hon. Jacob Collamer, former Postmaster General.

POSTAL MONEY ORDER SYSTEM.

The whole number of money order post offices now in operation is 1,224, of which 458 have been established since the date of the last annual report. This increase has occurred mainly in the western and southern States, where the facilities of the system for the transmission of money appear at present to be most needed.

-------------------------------------	-----------	----

During the previous fiscal year, ending June 30, 1866, the total amount of orders issued was $3,977,259 28, and of orders paid and repaid $3,903,890 22.

A comparison of these amounts with the corresponding transactions of the last fiscal year, as above exhibited, will show that during the latter period the money order business has been more than doubled.

The average sum for which money orders were issued last year was $19 45, an increase over that of the previous year, which was but $16 32.

The number of duplicate orders was 2,069, of which 1,915 were issued as substitutes for originals lost in the mails or otherwise, 141 were in lieu of orders rendered invalid because not presented for payment until more than one year after date, and 13 to replace orders made invalid in consequence of bearing, contrary to law, more than one indorsement.

The receipts and expenditures for the last fiscal year, as adjusted and stated by the auditor, were as follows:

RECEIPTS.

Premium received on exchange.....	1	00
	70,889	57

Excess of receipts over expenditures.....	$26,260	61

Being the gross amount of revenue derived from the transaction of the money order business. It is proper to state that the cost of the blanks used by postmasters, which are furnished by the Department of Public Printing, is not included in the foregoing statement of expenditures.

The sum of $5,973,969 70, being surplus funds accruing at the smaller post offices in transacting the money order business, was transmitted to first-class offices used as depositories either by means of national bank drafts or in registered packages by mail. The loss by the latter mode of transmission amounted, as above stated, to $3,562; but since the adoption of the improved system of registration on the 1st of June, only one registered package, containing a small remittance of money, has failed to reach its destination.

The transfers made by postmasters from the postage to the money order account for the purpose of meeting orders presented for payment amounted to $458,911 98; on the other hand the transfers from the money order to the postage account amounted to $548,880 56, showing that the latter is a debtor to the former account upon the transactions of the year in the sum of $89,968 58.

In the last annual report submitted by this Department it was recommended that certain modifications, with a view to greater efficiency and simplicity, should be made in the law establishing and regulating the money order system. The proposed changes were embodied in a bill which passed the Senate at its last session, but failed from lack of time and the pressure of legislative business to receive the consideration of the House of Representatives. I beg leave, therefore, to renew these recommendations, which were stated in detail in that report, together with the reasons which would render their adoption expedient.

To forge or counterfeit a money order is made a penal offense by the act of May 17, 1864. But one instance of this kind has happened since the establishment of the system. A late postmaster abstracted in June last fifty-two blank money orders, specially prepared and numbered, from the book which he delivered to his successor, filled them up in the usual manner, so that they appeared to have been duly issued on several postmasters for small sums, and forged upon each the signature of the postmaster. Payment of twenty-nine of these forged orders to the aggregate amount of $1,322 was obtained on presentation. The fraud was speedily detected and the guilty person was recently convicted of the crime of forgery at the United States court at Cleveland, Ohio, and duly sentenced to three years' imprisonment and hard labor and to pay a fine of $500.

By existing law a postmaster at a money order office is not authorized to issue an order payable by himself. Hence money order offices cannot at present be established at the stations or sub-post offices in the large cities, although in some instances these stations furnish ordinary postal facilities to a larger population in their vicinity than that of many considerable towns. It is evident that the convenience of residents within the delivery of such stations would be sensibly promoted if they were allowed to purchase and receive payment of money orders at these stations, instead of being compelled, as now, to resort for such facilities to the central post office of the city. The latter would, moreover, be relieved, to some extent, of a great and constantly increasing pressure of applicants for the purchase and payment of orders. It would also prove useful in the sparsely settled States, where the county town usually has a money order office, through which, under the proposed modification, small debts could readily be paid in any part of the county by means of money orders issued and payable at the post office in the county town, which is habitually visited by residents of the county.

I would therefore recommend that the law be so far modified as to permit a postmaster to issue orders payable at his own office.

MISCELLANEOUS.

It is gratifying to be able to state that, notwithstanding the increase of expenses of the Department, growing out of the increase of compensation of clerks, agents, and employes of the Department, and increase in the extent and expense of the mail service throughout the country and on the sea, the disbursements were not only kept within the estimates for 1867, but there remained an unexpended balance of over seven hundred thousand dollars to be applied toward the expenses for the current year. So great is the constant demand for increased mail service by the people of the Territories, and to supply the necessities of the older States, and so important is it to put into full operation the service in the States lately involved in the rebellion, that a considerable deficiency is estimated for the year 1869. A more detailed statement of anticipated revenues and expenditures will be found in another part of this report. It cannot be anticipated that the revenues of the Department derived from the sale of stamps and stamped envelopes, and from other sources, independent of specific appropriations, can equal the necessary expenditures of the Department while the service is being constantly increased, at great cost, to meet the wants of the people in sparsely settled Territories.

The faster the new Territories are peopled and their material resources developed the greater will be the postal revenues coming back to reimburse the Department for its outlays. Until the whole country is well settled by a stable, producing, thrifty population, it cannot be assumed, with certainty that the Post Office Department can become self-sustaining. New channels of postal communication are opening everywhere, and necessary expenses grow faster than legitimate revenue increases. When the waste country becomes better settled and the facilities for mail transportation increased and cheapened, as they will be in a very few years, the increase of revenues and comparative decrease of carrying expenses will entirely change the relation of the taxes and resources of the Department, and, at the present rates of postage, it will not only be self-sustaining, but furnish no inconsiderable revenue to the Government. There is no appropriation of public money which brings back, directly and indirectly, so large a return to the Government and the people as that made in aid of the postal service. Only one other Department of the Government gets back a revenue anywhere near its expenses in return for the outlays of public money.

Under the new postal conventions with foreign countries and under the contracts recently made for Atlantic service the large balances against the Department, which have burdened it for so many years, will be entirely wiped out, and a very handsome revenue derived in aid of its finances.

Previous to the present year a semi-weekly mail only was dispatched between this country and Europe, the sailing days from each side being Wednesday and Saturday. During this year a third weekly service has been established, and next year a fourth weekly service will be added, all by fast steamships of the first class, and the period is not distant when a regular daily mail communication will be maintained across the Atlantic. We exchange direct international mails, under provisions of postal conventions, with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, France and Algeria, Belgium, the North German Union, Bremen, Hamburg, the Netherlands, Italy, Switzerland, Canada and British North American provinces, Mexico, Guatemala, Venezuela, and the colonial government of Hong Kong, China; and through the mails of one or more of those countries, used as intermediaries, with Russia, Poland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Spain, Portugal, Austria, Greece, European and Asiatic Turkey, Syria, Egypt, Africa, Mediterranean and Atlantic coasts, islands of the Mediterranean sea and Indian ocean, Arabia, India, China, Japan, Ceylon, Sumatra, Java, Borneo, Moluccas, Philippine islands, Australia, New Zealand, Madeira islands, Canary islands, St. Helena, Ascension, Azores, Cape de Verdes, Bermuda, Bahamas, West India islands, Falkland islands, Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay, the Argentine Republic, English, French, and Dutch Guiana, countries of Central America, New Granada, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chili, and many other portions of the world.

Direct mail steamship communications are also maintained between the United States and neighboring countries, including Brazil, countries of Central America, Bahamas, Bermudas and West India islands, British Columbia and Vancouver's island, Sandwich islands, Japan, and China.

The exhibits of this report show a remarkable increase in the importance of the foreign mail service, and the increased care and watchfulness required of those in direct charge of it. I therefore repeat my request that authority be given to appoint a superintendent of foreign mails, and an additional clerk for that branch of the service.

I repeat, also, my recommendation that authority be given to appoint a superintendent of the opening and distribution of dead letters.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

The subject of connecting the telegraphic system of the country with the postal service has attracted public attention, and it received, to some extent, the consideration of my predecessor. It has recently transpired that the telegraphic system of Great Britain has been put in charge of the British post office department. It is a matter of very great importance, and its propriety and practicability ought to be thoroughly investigated by Congress. The most efficient mode of examination of the subject, in my judgment, would be the appointment of a special commission to inquire into the working of a new arrangement in Great Britain, and into its feasibility in the United States, and report to Congress for such action as may be wisely taken.

I am compelled again to call attention to the gross frauds perpetrated upon the Department by violations of the franking privilege in almost all parts of the country. The fac simile franks of different members of Congress are freely used to circulate obscene books and papers, lottery circulars, business cards, &c., and to cover all kinds of business and domestic correspondence of persons not authorized by law to frank mailable matter. Unless something is done speedily by Congress to check this serious mischief, the annual appropriation to cover the transmission of free matter will have to be increased from $700,000 to at least $1,000,000. To avoid the continuance of this serious abuse in the use of the names of members of Congress without their knowledge or consent I again urge that the law be so changed as to require the written signature of the person exercising the franking privilege upon the matter franked; and, to relieve the heads of Departments and Bureaus of great labor, that a franking clerk be authorized by law for each Department of the Government, with the authority to frank all matter pertaining to the Department for which he is so appointed.

The commercial enterprises of the people of the United States are carried on to a very large extent by the use of foreign ships. The ocean mail service also is performed to a very great extent by foreign ships. The commercial and postal interests of the country ought to be made aids to each other. We are too dependent upon the enterprises of other peoples in the transaction of our business. Some encouragement ought to be given in some way to our own ship-builders and citizens engaged in ocean commerce to build ships and buy ships and own ships, to be used in our own business. It is to be hoped that Congress will relieve labor and ship-building materials of taxes and impositions, so that our own ships may be built in our own waters, to bear our commerce and carry our mails. As long as subsidies are paid by other Governments to aid in establishing and maintaining lines of ocean steamers to and from European ports, giving them the command of the carrying trade, with comparatively little competition, it is due to the citizens of the United States that like aid should be furnished to American enterprise. This can, in my judgment, be very properly and profitably done by subsidies to lines of steamers already established, or to be established, as a consideration for carrying the ocean mails.

Respectfully submitted.

ALEXANDER W. RANDALL,
Postmaster General.

The PRESIDENT.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, November 18, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to submit a summary of the results which were attained during the last fiscal year, in the branches of the public service committed to the supervision of this Department. The accompanying reports of the chiefs of bureaus and other officers furnish that specific information on matters of detail which could not be embraced in this paper without unduly extending its limits.

None of these branches occupies a higher place in the public regard than that which relates to the national domain. Much of this noble patrimony was acquired by cession from the States which won our independence. Successive additions to it have been made by treaties, the first of which was concluded with France in 1803, and the last with Russia, ceding to us her American possessions, which cover an area of 369,529,600 acres.

Our legislation has been adapted to the peculiar status of the territory acquired from foreign Powers and to the adjudication of individual rights claimed under them. Experience has suggested salutary changes in the mode of disposing of the public lands. Credit on sales has been long since abolished. The right of preëemption, originally conferred only by special enactment, has become a permanent part of our system. At a later period the homestead policy was ingrafted upon it. In no respect has the wisdom of Congress been more strikingly displayed than in the adoption of a general and uniform method of public surveys. Until they are extended over the soil, the proprietorship thereof remains in the Government. This policy offers a marked contrast to that of the nations which established colonies within our limits, and secures to the purchaser an indisputable right to a well-defined tract. Notwithstanding our settlements have progressed with a rapidity unequalled in the history of nations, few serious controversies have arisen in regard to titles emanating from the United States. Our present system is so simple and efficient, so well adapted to the wants of our population and the interests of the service, that it is not susceptible of much improvement. Such modifications as were needed to perfect it were alluded to in my last annual report. No necessity exists for making at this time more special reference to them.

During the fiscal year 7,041,114.50 acres were disposed of, as follows:

	Acres.
Sold for cash.....	756,619.61
Located with military warrants.....	476 780.00
Taken for homesteads.....	1,788,043.49
Approved to States as swamp.....	1,066,450.15
Grants to railroads, wagon roads, and canals.....	533,168.52
Located with college scrip.....	2,420,072.73
Total.....	7,041,114.50

This quantity exceeds that disposed of during the previous year by 2,411,800 acres.

The cash receipts of the office from sales and fees of various kinds amounted to $1,347,862 52; a sum greater than that received the previous year by more than half a million dollars.

During the last fiscal year and the quarter of the present year ending 30th September last, 550 Indian patents were issued, embracing 89,824 acres.

Under the several acts of Congress relating thereto, 275 patents for private land claims in California have been issued, embracing 4,363,300 acres.

Contracts have been entered into for surveying and marking the northern boundary of California, that portion of the eastern boundary of Oregon which lies due south of the confluence of Owyhee with Snake river, to the northern line of Nevada, and the northern boundary of New Mexico. It is recommended that appropriations be made for the survey of the northern and eastern boundaries of Colorado Territory and the northern and eastern boundaries of Nevada.

The report of the Commissioner evinces great labor and research. He discusses with his accustomed ability many questions in connection with the landed interests of the United States.

The last soldier of the Revolution who was on the pension-rolls at the date of my last annual report has since died. By special act of Congress two other veterans of that war have been placed on the rolls at the rate of $500 per annum. Of the widows of such soldiers there are on the rolls the names of 997; of these 119 were married prior to 1st January, 1800.

Of wars subsequent to the Revolution and prior to the rebellion the number of pensioned widows and orphans of soldiers was 1,810 at the close of the last fiscal year.

During the past year, 16,452 new applications for invalid pensions of soldiers, at an aggregate annual rate of $1,180,194 72, and 13,946 applications for increased pension of invalid soldiers, at an aggregate annual rate of $1,089,003 62, have been examined and allowed. During the same period 19,660 original applications for pension by widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of soldiers were admitted, at an aggregate annual rate of $1,979,062 67. Of applications for increased pay by the same class, 19,309 were admitted, at a total annual rate of $1,150,646. On the 30th June, 1867, there were enrolled 70,802 invalid military pensioners, whose yearly pensions amounted to $6,478,004 14, and 82,291 widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of soldiers, whose yearly pensions amounted to $9,664,075 83, making the total aggregate of Army pensions 153,093, at a total annual rate of $16,142,079 97.

The whole amount paid during the last fiscal year to invalid military pensioners was $6,428,532 53; to widows, orphans, and dependent relatives, $11,873,182 72; a grand total of $18,301,715 25, which includes the expenses of the disbursing agencies.

During the year ending June 30, 1867, there were admitted 137 new applications for invalid Navy pensions, at an annual rate of $10,317; 206 applications for increased pensions of the same class at an annual aggregate of $17,892; 233 original applications of widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of those who died in the Navy, at an aggregate rate of $81,856 per annum, and 120 pensions of the same class were increased at a total yearly rate of $6,792.

On the 30th June, 1867, on the rolls of the Navy pensioners were the names of 1,054 invalids, at an annual aggregate of $80,652 25, and 1,827 widows, orphans, and dependent relatives, at an aggregate annual rate of $805,742 25. The amount paid during the last fiscal year to Navy invalids was $77,241 28, and to widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of officers and seamen of the Navy $240,999 92; a total amount of $318,241 20.

During the year there were added to the number of pensioners of all classes 36,482; there were 7,932 dropped from various causes, leaving on the rolls June 30, 1867, 155,474. The total annual amount of pensions of all classes was $16,449,822 22, and the amount paid was $18,619,956 46, which includes expenses of disbursement.

During the year ending September 30, 1867, there were admitted 954 applications for bounty land warrants, requiring 148,963 acres of land to satisfy them.

The invested Navy pension fund now amounts to $13,000,000, and there is an uninvested balance of $229,246 37. As the interest on the invested sum far exceeds the amount required for the Navy pensions, Congress provided, by act approved March 2, 1867, for the increase of the pensions of meritorious disabled officers, seamen, and marines. The Secretary of the Navy has favorably reported seven claims of this class. There is an urgent necessity for an increased appropriation for special investigation to prevent frauds upon the Government in obtaining pensions. The amount saved to the Government by such investigations has far exceeded the expenditures in conducting them, while their chief value arises from their preventive influence.

The pension act of July 14, 1862, is the most comprehensive and munificent ever made by any Government for similar purposes. The administration of its provisions evinced the necessity of amending it in several essential particulars. A total disability entitled a pensioner to a fixed amount. A wound causing the loss of a right hand and one rendering the sufferer entirely and permanently helpless, were each rated at the maximum sum. The act in this regard has been wisely changed, and it would be difficult to suggest a more equitable rule than that which now exists, although it is subject to the infirmity of all general enactments, and occasionally fails to make full provision for an individual case. Former laws made no provision for relatives in the ascending or collateral lines. The act of 1862 first gave a pension to the dependent mother of the deceased soldier or officer, or, if there were none, to his orphan sisters under the age of sixteen years. The act of June 6, 1866, so amends the fourth section of the act of 1862 as to make its provisions apply to and include the orphan brother as well as sister, and the father as well as the mother. That section in its original shape made no mention of the mother, and it is very questionable, when the father and the orphan sisters are the only surviving relatives, whether the former or latter would be entitled to a pension, or whether they would not have a joint claim. The mother is regarded as having the exclusive right where the father is also living, but I suggest that the order in which the relatives should be entitled to take precedence be more clearly defined by declaratory legislation.

The third section of the act of July 25, 1866, extends the act of 1862 and the acts supplementary and amendatory thereto, as far as applicable, to the pensions under previous laws, except revolutionary pensioners. The practical construction of this act by the Pension Bureau has limited its effect merely to the specific increases allowed to pensioners, and does not recognize it as making a new class of pensioners, or as placing, in every respect, all pensions, except revolutionary, upon the basis of said acts. This construction may not give full effect, in the opinion of Congress, to the intent and purpose of the act; but should they not otherwise direct, it will be adhered to in the adjudication of all cases to which it applies.

The act of 1862 was enacted in reference to the then existing war. It was confined to diseases contracted or wounds received in the military or naval service, and in the line of duty, after March 4, 1861, and deaths resulting therefrom. Hostilities have ceased. I submit that an amendment should be made excluding the allowance of a pension by reason of death the result of disease hereafter contracted, except upon the occurrence of a future war. An examination of the various acts of Congress granting military pensions, commencing with that of March 16, 1802, fixing our military peace establishments, satisfies me that the amendment suggested is not only right and proper, but in keeping with our past legislation. That act provided that the widow, or if there were none then the child of a commissioned officer who should die by reason of a wound received in the actual service of the United States, should be entitled to receive for the period of five years half the monthly pay to which he was entitled at the time of his death. The act of June 29, 1813, conferred the same limited right upon the same condition, although war was then existing; and in 1816, after the termination of hostilities, the allowance to the widows or children of officers of the Army was confined to instances where such officers had died during the war, or should thereafter die of wounds received in the service. In regard to the naval service the provision was extended to widows the death of whose husbands in the service was caused by disease contracted, or of casualties by drowning or otherwise, or of injuries received in the line of duty. Subsequent acts, in regard to the Navy, renewed for a term of years the provision for half pay to widows.

The first section of the act of July 4, 1836, in reference to the widows of officers or enlisted men of the militia, including volunteers who had died since April 20, 1818, conferred a right to half pay when the officer or enlisted man died in the service, or in consequence of a wound received in service. The first section of the act of July 21, 1848, declares that the foregoing provision shall be applicable to all widows and orphans of officers or enlisted men of the Army of the United States who were in the Army of the United States on the 1st day of March, 1846, or at any subsequent period during the then war with Mexico. The second section extends the provision to the widows or children of officers or enlisted men of the regular Army, or volunteers, who had died since April 1, 1846, or who might die during the war with Mexico of wounds received or disease contracted during said war; provided that the death had occurred, or should thereafter occur, during the time that such officer or enlisted man was in actual service and in the line of duty, or while returning to his usual place of residence in the United States after having been discharged upon a surgeon's certificate of disability incurred from wounds received or disease contracted while in the line of duty, or on the march to join the army of Mexico; and declares that the act shall not be applicable to the widows and orphans of officers or enlisted men who had not served in or upon the borders of Mexico. The act of February 2, 1849, construes the second section of the act of 1848 so as to make it applicable to all those whose husbands or fathers remained in the service to the day of their death, or who received an honorable discharge, or died after their return home of wounds received or disease contracted during the war and in the line of duty. Successive acts of Congress were passed from time to time to which I need not specially allude. They all seem, except in reference to the widows of revolutionary soldiers, to rest upon the obviously just proposition that in order to give a pension to the widow of an officer of the regular Army or to his children, if he died without leaving a widow, he must have died of a wound received, or else that the mortal disease was contracted during actual hostilities. Prior, therefore, to the act of 1862, neither the widow nor the children of such an officer were entitled to a pension by reason of his death resulting from disease contracted in time of peace, and such has been the ruling of the Pension Bureau.

The death of an officer in charge of a bureau in the War Department, by reason of disease contracted since the termination of the late war and during the time in which he was engaged in the performance of his official duties in this city, devolves upon his widow a pension right, not for a limited term of years, but during her widowhood. He is not subject to the imminent perils or to the exposure which in time of war make such havoc of human life. His duties are such as ordinarily appertain to an officer in the civil service. His appointment is for life, and assures him, under existing laws, pay and emoluments eighty-five per cent. greater than the salary of an officer of corresponding grade in the other Departments, whose duties are equally laborious, and whose official tenure is far more precarious. This case is not exceptional. During peace the military is not in a greater degree than the civil officer exposed to casualties that endanger health, life, or limb. The claim, therefore, of his widow upon the country, if he dies of disease then contracted, is not stronger than that of the widow of the civil officer, and our laws have never granted to the latter a pension by reason of the services and death of her husband. I recommend such an amendment of the law as will exclude from its benefits the widow or children of an officer of the Army who shall die of disease not contracted, or from a cause not occurring during war and in the line of duty. The same provision should be applied to the Navy, with such modifications as the arduous and peculiar character of the service may, in the opinion of Congress, require. Our legislation will then be in harmony with that which preceded the enactment of a law deemed expedient during a civil war in which the country needed the services of all her sons, and offered the highest rewards to those who, on the field or the deck, imperiled their lives in saving her from dishonor and death.

Under our present legislation a pension unclaimed for fourteen months after the same has become due is not payable at the agency for paying pensions, but must be adjusted at the Third Auditor's office and paid by warrant on the Treasury. No good reason exists for the continuance of this practice. It would be better to regard a failure during a longer period to demand payment as presumptive proof that the right thereto had ceased by the restoration of the invalid to health and physical ability, the marriage of the widow, or the happening of some other condition which by law determines it. A new application would then be required. The applicant's name should be restored and the accrued pension paid as other pensions if the presumption arising from the lapse of time be overcome by the proofs.

The applications for pensions notwithstanding they have increased in number by reason of the recent modifications of the laws have been determined with the utmost dispatch under the supervision of the efficient chief of the bureau. His report is worthy of the highest encomium for its comprehensiveness, perspicuity, and brevity.

Our Indian relations have assumed a new and interesting aspect. The steady approach of emigration to the grounds heretofore devoted to the chase, and the rapid progress of the railroads pointing toward the Pacific and traversing the country over which the Indians from time immemorial have roamed, imperiously demand that the policy of concentrating them upon reservations should, whenever practicable, be adopted. Until recently there was territory enough to supply the demands of the white race without unduly encroaching upon the districts where the Indians subsisted by hunting. This condition of things no longer exists. Christianity and civilization, with the industrial arts, are spreading over the entire region from the Mississippi to the Pacific. The Indians are in possession of vast tracts of country, abounding in precious metals, or rich in sources of agricultural wealth. These invite the enterprise of the adventurous pioneer, who, in seeking a home and fortune, is constantly pressing upon the abode of the red man.

By an inevitable law, two races, one civilized and the other barbarous, are being brought face to face. The obligations which rest upon the Government extend to both. Each is justly entitled to protection. Our duty requires us to devise a system by which civilization, with its attendant blessings, may be fostered and extended, and at the same time protection be secured to the tribes.

The estimated number of Indians is about three hundred thousand, spreading from Lake Superior to the Pacific ocean. Those east of the Mississippi, with few exceptions, are on reservations; so also are the tribes in Kansas north of the Arkansas, and those located between the western border of Arkansas and the country known as the "leased lands." Treaties were negotiated last winter with the Kansas tribes, and submitted to the Senate for its constitutional action. If ratified and in good faith executed, these tribes will be provided with homes, where they will soon become self-sustaining, as they have already adopted the habits of civilized life and become familiar with agricultural pursuits. They will then require from us little beyond protection against the intrusion of the whites, and the faithful performance of our stipulations.

A consideration of the proper policy to be pursued in respect to the wild tribes presents more difficult questions. As long as they cling to their nomadic habits and subsist by hunting and fishing, encroachment upon their hunting grounds—and it does not seem possible to prevent it—will necessarily lead to hostilities and a devastation of the frontier settlements.

The tribes within our borders are capable of civilization. The past furnishes gratifying evidence that well-directed and persistent efforts to that end will be rewarded with success. It is, however, a work of time. The arts of civilization but slowly displaced the primitive tastes and habits of our own race. It must be so with the Indian; he cannot immediately be transformed from the hunter to the farmer or mechanic. There are intermediate states through which he has to pass. He should be gradually won from the chase to a pastoral life, and under its influences he will ultimately acquire a taste for agricultural pursuits. The first step in the process of improvement is to localize the Indians. The same district should not be appropriated to the savage and the civilized, nor should tribes between whom hereditary feuds exist be brought together, as it would be followed by disastrous results. No objection is perceived to placing the civilized upon contiguous tracts; on the contrary, it is expedient to do so, and, as soon as their consent can be obtained, to subject them to the same system of government and laws. But such a policy is wholly inapplicable to the wild tribes; they require, in proportion to their numbers, much more territory, and can only be governed and controlled, and trained to habits of industry on separate and widely distant reservations, selected in view of their adaptation to grazing as well as tillage, and amply stocked by the Government with large numbers of cattle, sheep, and goats. The Indian will discover that a herdsman's life affords a better and surer subsistence than a precarious dependence upon the chase. A desire for the acquisition of individual property will soon spring up, and should be gratified by appropriating to each adult a limited quantity of land for his exclusive use. A title thereto should be assured to him, and farming utensils furnished. He will then learn to cultivate the soil. The mechanic arts will follow. The schoolmaster, and above all the missionary, with the blessings and hopes of religion, will crown and perpetuate the work.

The unoccupied country west of the Missouri is of such vast extent that large regions, if properly selected, at points remote from the great lines of travel, may be reserved without detriment to any public interest. Long before the tide of emigration will reach them they can, by an equitable arrangement with the Indians, be reduced to the dimensions required by the actual wants of an agricultural population.

The selection of suitable sites, and the removal of the Indians to them, cannot be accomplished in the short time allotted to the commissioners appointed by the act of Congress of July last. Two commissions, each consisting of not less than three persons, should be appointed, and adequate means placed at the disposal of the Secretary of the Interior for the efficient completion of the work. No consideration of the time or expenditure likely to be required should be suffered to defeat an object of such surpassing importance. A guarantee against the useless consumption of time or money should be found in the character of the persons selected. The cost will be very inconsiderable compared with that of a war. Had a tithe of our outlay in military operations against the Indians during the present year been honestly and judiciously applied to purposes of peace, the necessity of a resort to force would have been avoided. It is more humane and economical to subside Indians than to fight them. A wise and just policy will soon relieve us from either necessity.

The salaries of the superintendents of Indian affairs and Indian agents are inadequate. Increased compensation would enable the Department to secure the services of men of undoubted capacity and integrity, and tend to remove the temptation to commit those frauds, which, before and since the transfer of the Indian Bureau to this Department, were and still are imputed to officers performing duties and sustaining relations to the Indians such as devolve upon this class of public servants. I take pleasure, however, in bearing testimony to the ability and fidelity of many now in the Indian service. Some of those of the greatest merit have announced their intention to resign on account of the insufficiency of their pay. Loss to the Government and serious wrong to the Indians would be prevented by an appropriation for the employment of special agents, to investigate and correct, at remote posts, frauds and abuses, which cannot be properly dealt with by the instrumentalities now subject to the order of the Department.

The necessities of the service require that a superintendent should be immediately appointed for each of the Territories of Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and Dakota.

During the year ending September 30, 1867, there were 16,547 applications for patents; 11,655 patents (including reissues and designs) were issued; 1,224 applications were allowed, but patents were not issued thereon, by reason of the non-payment of the final fees; 3,486 caveats were filed; 96 applications for extension were received, and 82 extensions of patents were granted.

During the same period the receipts were $611,910 61, and the expenditures $553,599 98, leaving a balance of $58,310 63, which, added to $228,297 26, the balance on hand September 30, 1866, makes the amount now in the Treasury to the credit of the patent fund $386,607 89.

In my last annual report I advised a repeal of the law conferring upon a party the right of appeal from the Commissioner of Patents to one of the judges of the supreme court of this District. Subsequent reflection has confirmed my conviction of the soundness of the views then presented. In no other instance is an appellate power given to a judge to affirm or reverse the action of an executive officer. This exceptional proceeding is essentially different from an action instituted in a court of original jurisdiction for a mandamus against an officer to enforce the performance of a specific duty, or from that wherein an injunction is sought to restrain him from the commission of an act which would work irreparable injury to rights of property. Neither does it bear any analogy, even the most remote, to a suit in which either party thereto asserts a right or resists a claim resting upon an adjudication to which the other party was a stranger, and which was rendered by an executive officer, or a special tribunal, authorized to deal only between one party and the Government. The court having cognizance of the suit may review such adjudication and correct errors of law or fact to the prejudice of either party. This doctrine has been announced by the Supreme Court in suits where the title to land was in issue and where a party relied upon the decision of the General Land Office awarding a right of preemption or vacating an entry. It has also been applied in cases involving a claim to priority of invention, as an inquiry is not precluded by a patent in any court in which its validity is brought in question. A judicial determination of conflicting rights is final and conclusive on the parties and those subsequently claiming under them. The decision of the judge on appeal awarding a patent, even in interference cases, has not this, nor indeed any greater force or effect than that of the Patent Bureau, and may be reviewed in the same manner when a proper case arises. I respectfully submit that an appellate authority over an executive officer should not be devolved upon a judge, especially where his decision upon the questions in controversy has not the properties or binding efficacy of a judgment at law, or a degree in equity. Delays are occasioned and expenses incurred by this objectionable and anomalous practice without any compensating benefit to the inventor or the public.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company at the date of my last annual report had constructed its road to a point twenty-three miles west of the one hundredth meridian of longitude, being 270 miles west from the initial point near Omaha. Since then you have accepted 220 miles, and the Government commissioners are now engaged in examining another completed section of twenty miles.

The point where the railroad crosses Crow creek at Cheyenne, 517 miles west of the initial point, was represented by the company to be at the eastern base of the Rocky mountains, and they requested that it should be so "fixed" for the purposes mentioned in the eleventh section of the act of 1862, which confers a subsidy of $48,000 per mile for a distance of 150 miles westerly from such base.

You determined to defer final action until after a thorough personal inspection of the locality and the contiguous country should have been made by an experienced civil engineer. Mr. Jacob Blickensderfer, jr., was selected for that purpose and instructed to set forth in his report all the facts elicited by such inspection, and to accompany it with a map of the region and a profile of the proposed line of road. After accepting the appointment, he proceeded as far west as Dodge's summit, stated to be the crest of the water shed of the continent, about thirty miles northwest of Bridger's pass, and examined the general formation of the ranges known as the Rocky mountains. South of Long's peak these mountains consist of one single compact range, attaining a great elevation, while north thereof they form three distinct ranges. One of these, the Black hills, tends nearly north to Laramie peak, where it divides into two branches. The second, the Medicine Bow range, divides the waters of the Laramie from those of the north fork of the Platte, and bears north-northwest to Elk mountain, near Fort Halleck, where it also divides into two branches, termed the Rattlesnake hills. The third, taking a direction nearly northwest to Bridger's pass, Dodge's summit, and South pass, divides the waters which flow into the Atlantic from those which flow into the Pacific.

From the point of divergence near Long's peak these ranges rapidly decline in elevation to the northward, while the intervening country approximates in altitude to that of the mountains themselves. The passes of the Black hills, although much lower than those south of Long's peak, within the drainage of the Platte, are nevertheless considerably higher than those of the Medicine Bow range or of the water shed of the continent between Bridger's pass and South pass. The approaches to the Black hills, especially from the east, are abrupt and the crest is comparatively sharp, and marked by bold, rocky elevations, which form distinguishing landmarks visible at a great distance. The ascent to the crest of the water shed is so gentle as to be scarcely perceptible, and the crest itself is a wide open plain, free from rocks or bold elevations, and its inclinations for miles of extent can be determined only by the aid of instruments.

The located line of road crosses the three ranges formed by the Black hills, the Medicine Bow mountains or their continuations, the Rattlesnake hills, and the water-shed proper. The altitude above tide-water of the points where it strikes them, respectively, is as follows: Black hills 8,242 feet, Rattlesnake hills 7,132 feet, and Dodge's summit 7,108 feet. The height of the country between these summits may be inferred from the elevations at the following places, to wit: 7,150 feet at Fort Sanders, beyond the western base of the Black hills; 6,569 feet at the crossing of the Medicine Bow river, the lowest point touched by the railroad line between the Black hills and Rattlesnake summit; 6,484 feet at the crossing of the north fork of the Platte, the lowest point between Rattlesnake and Dodge's summit. It appears that the Black hills loom up more than a thousand feet above the crest of the water-shed of the continent, and that the region between them is nowhere greatly depressed below the latter, except in the immediate valleys of the water-courses. Mr. Blickensderfer is of opinion that a line of railway will encounter at the Black hills greater obstacles and require in its construction a much greater outlay than in passing over either of the ranges west of them. The country known as the Laramie plains, and situate between the Black hills and the water-shed of the continent proper, is essentially mountainous, being but elevated table-land hemmed in by mountains, and when examined found to possess but few of the characteristics of a plain. These interesting facts in regard to that distant region satisfied him that the Black hills constitute a prominent portion of the Rocky mountains, and that the eastern base of the latter is reached by the road at a point on those hills 6.037 miles west of Cheyenne, and, according to the railroad surveys 525.078 miles west from the eastern terminus of the road.

Upon a consideration of the report and the maps accompanying it you concurred in the recommendation of the Department and ordered that the point so described should be considered in the administration of the acts of Congress for the purpose therein mentioned as the eastern base of the Rocky mountains. The Secretary of the Treasury and the railroad company have been informed of your order.

Reports from the Government directors, dated July 23 and August 16, 1867, gave a very favorable report upon the location of the road and the energy with which the work was being prosecuted. Two machine-shops were in full operation—one at Omaha costing $250,000, and another at North Platte costing $20,000, employing 350 men, with a capacity to make 20 cars per week and repair all the machinery and rolling stock of the road. At the latter date the company had 3,500 men employed in grading the road-bed, and 450 in laying the superstructure.

The company, under date of the 11th of October, report that the road during the present year would probably be extended to a point 537 miles west of Omaha, and that station buildings, engine-houses, water-stations, and the telegraph line to meet the wants of the road had been built. Shops and an engine-house have been commenced at Cheyenne. The grading, masonry, and bridging in the mountain regions were in active progress. The road has been definitely located 600 miles, and the earthwork will be finished to that point the present year.

The surveys of the line have been revised through to Salt Lake. A reconnaissance of the various routes has been made by the chief and consulting engineers in order to secure the most favorable location which the topographical features of the country will admit. The Indian raids in the course of the past season have seriously interrupted the progress of the engineers. Great vigilance on the part of surveying parties, and their protection by military escorts, have been indispensable.

The total cost of the road to October 1, 1867, (unadjusted accounts with contractors not included) amounts, according to the report, to $21,757,488 79

Of this sum there was received from—

Capital stock.....	$5,369,750 00
United States bonds.....	7,280,000 00
First mortgage bonds.....	4,090,000 00
Land-grant bonds.....	3,000,000 00
Unfunded debt and cash.....	1,661,424 04
Income from earnings.....	356,314 75
	$21,757,488 79

The road on the 1st of July, 1867, was in operation to Julesburg, 377 miles, and receipts from all sources amounted to $1,015,195 29, and expenses to $658,880 54, leaving the net earnings $356,314 75. The receipts of the road from travel, emigration, and the business of the region tributary to it were greatly diminished in consequence of Indian difficulties.

The rolling stock consists of 53 locomotives, 15 passenger and 875 other cars.

The company express their intention to prosecute this enterprise with the vigor and efficiency that have thus far characterized its advancement.

On the 24th of October last you accepted, upon the report of the Government commissioners, a section of twenty miles of the Central Pacific railroad of California, terminating at a point ninety-four miles distant from Sacramento.

On the 28th of January last the vice president of the company filed a map showing the definite location of said railroad from the Big Bend of the Truckee to Humboldt Wells. From the best information at my command it appeared that this route possessed great advantages over all others, and I gave my "consent and approval" to the location, pursuant to the authority conferred by the second section of the act approved July 3, 1866, and forwarded the map to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with directions to adjust the grant of lands upon the basis furnished by it.

On the 22d of July, 1867, this company forwarded to the Department a map of a location from Humboldt Wells, via the north pass of Pequop and Toano mountains, the north point of the Ombe mountains, Red Dome pass, and the north end of Salt lake, to Weber river, a distance of 214 miles. The report of the chief engineer accompanying the map states that this line is the most direct and advantageous of the three that had been surveyed eastwardly from Humboldt Wells. It appears that the highest point is 6,200 feet above the sea, and 585 feet above Humboldt Wells, and is reached through a narrow valley with a grade of seventy feet per mile. From this height the line descends with a nearly uniform grade of six feet per mile for thirty-four miles through the north pass of the Pequop mountains, and along the slopes of the latter to the north pass of the Toano mountains. From thence it passes along a valley from one eighth to a mile in width to the eastern base of those mountains, making the descent of seventeen miles with a grade ranging from sixty-two to seventy feet per mile. Seventy feet is the highest grade found on the line, and it occurs for short distances at two other places besides those mentioned. No very difficult or expensive rock cutting is required on this route. I informed the company that I was not prepared to approve this location.

A report upon this road, dated October 7, 1867, has been received from the Government commissioners. They state that it crosses the Sierra Nevada mountains 105 miles from Sacramento, at an elevation of 7,042 feet above the sea. From the point where it was then built 917 feet only must be overcome to reach the summit, a distance of eleven miles. Between the seventy-seventh and one hundred and thirty-seventh mile posts there are fifteen tunnels of an aggregate length of 5,166 feet. During the past year about fifty miles of road have been in progress of construction; the greater part lying on the eastern and western slopes of the Sierra Nevadas. Fifteen miles of the portion on the eastern slope are graded, and the track is being laid at the rate of about one half mile per day. By the time these eighteen miles are laid six more will probably be graded and ready for the track-layers, making in all twenty-four miles east of the summit. On the western slope a larger force of laborers are at work, and it is believed that with a favorable season the grading will be completed and the track laid over the summit before the snow occasions a suspension of work. The company have not been able during the past season to procure the requisite number of laborers, but it is expected that next season this difficulty will be removed. There is on hand iron sufficient to lay one hundred and ten miles of track, and enough more in transitu to lay fifty additional miles. In the snow belt the rails used weigh sixty-three pounds to the linear yard, and are put together with fish-joints instead of chairs. At Sacramento the company have erected, along the river front, wharves and derricks capable of moving an immense freight from vessels to the cars. There are 27 locomotives in use, and 20 more, with material for 250 cars, are on the way from Atlantic ports. There is on hand material for 75 cars. Eight locomotives recently purchased are being set up. The company report to the commissioners that 37,738 acres of land granted to aid in the construction of the road had been sold for $77,570, the greater part upon a credit of five years.

The following table gives the gross earnings and expenses for the years 1865 and 1866, and for 1867 up to September:

	Gross earnings.	Operating expenses.	Net earnings.
1865.....	$401,965 33	$122,375 30	$279,590 03
1866.....	864,976 82	200,722 96	664,253 86
1867.....	804,326 53	197,974 13	606,352 40
Total.....	$2,071,768 68	$521,072 39	$1,550,696 29

The net profit, therefore, over operating expenses in thirty-two months is the large sum of $1,550,696 29.

Since the commencement of business operations, the company represent that they have paid to the United Government for taxes, stamps, &c., the sum of $288,000.

At the date of my last annual report the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, had constructed its road to Fort Riley, 135 miles west from the initial point on the line dividing the States of Kansas and Missouri. Since that date this company has constructed 150 miles of its road, which you have accepted. The Government commissioners are now examining an additional section of 20 miles, completing the road for a distance of 305 miles from said initial point. The company report the road as provided with round-houses, repair-shops, turn-tables, water-tanks, sidings, &c., sufficient to meet the immediate wants of business, and that the necessary warehouses and depot buildings have been erected at the stations for the accommodation of passengers and freight.

The equipment now in use consists of 25 locomotives, 18 passenger and 736 other cars. Contracts have been made for two locomotives, two passenger and 140 other cars. Iron has been ordered sufficient to complete the road to the three hundred and thirty-fifth mile, nearly all of which has been delivered.

The aggregate earnings of the company for ten months and fifteen days, from October 15, 1866, are represented to have been $1,220,483 08. It is also represented that during the same period the business done for the Government amounted to $358,949 49; that the fifty per cent. retained therefrom is in excess of the interest paid by the Government on the bonds issued to the company during ten months and fifteen days $6,189 53.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

A table is submitted showing that the amount retained by the United States Treasurer from that due the company on the Government business for the month of August last is nearly eight per cent. per annum of the principal of the bonds issued to the company on account of the construction of the road. This would repay the principal at no distant period by the Government business alone, should it be continued to the same extent. The payment of the bonds at maturity is therefore considered by the company to be fully assured, and the road is being built, so far as the Government is concerned, simply by the loan of its credit for a term of years upon ample security, and without the actual expenditure of a single dollar from the public Treasury. The company have organized and sent into the field during the past year three large surveying parties, and have already had careful instrumental examinations made, covering an aggregate distance of more than 1,300 miles. Two lines have been run from Fort Wallace to Denver, and an advantageous route discovered. One has been surveyed from Fort Wallace to the Arkansas river, and thence up the Purgatory valley, through the passes of the Raton mountains, to Fort Union, and with two lines thence, through the easternmost range of the Rocky mountains, to Albuquerque and Fort Craig, on the Rio Grande. Another has been examined up the valley of the Huerfano river, through the Sangre de Cristo pass, via Fort Garland, to the Rio Grande, and thence, via Santa Fé, to Albuquerque. Surveying parties, organized into two divisions, are now making a careful survey of two general routes from the Rio Grande to the Pacific—one along the thirty-fifth parallel west from Albuquerque; the other from Fort Craig, along the thirty-second parallel, by what is known as the Gila route. The surveys have met the most favorable anticipations. At no point will the grades exceed the maximum allowed by law for the Pacific railroad, and such grades will be for short distances, and at only two or three points between Fort Wallace and the Rio Grande. The highest altitude attained on this line is 7,846 feet above tide-water. The company express the conviction that had the work not been delayed by unexpected difficulties with the Indians, the road would have been finished to Fort Wallace by the end of the present year, and they have every reason to expect that it will reach a point 335 miles west from the Missouri river by the 31st proximo.

Forty miles of the road of the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company have been accepted since the date of my last annual report, and the Government commissioners are now engaged in examining another section of twenty miles.

This company, after the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, had vacated its line along the Republican fork of the Kansas river, claimed that, under existing laws, they were entitled to extend their road from its intersection with such vacated line, and on the latter to the one hundredth meridian, and to receive, in aid of the construction thereof, the same subsidy in lands and bonds per mile as for the first hundred miles of their road. The Department, February 19, 1867, rejected the claim upon the ground that the promised subsidy was confined to "one hundred miles in length next to the Missouri river." The lands on such vacated line, that had been originally withdrawn, were, therefore, restored to their original status.

It appears from the company's report, dated the 11th of October last, that the road has been definitely located for 100 miles, and terminates in the valley of the Little Blue river, near the mouth of Coon creek, in township four, range six, east of the sixth principal meridian, in Marshall county, Kansas. The construction of bridges occasions a heavy expense. The most important is that across the Big Blue river, 434 feet in length and 31 feet above low water. The equipment of the road consists of 6 locomotives, 2 passenger and 144 other cars. A substantial round-house, with stalls for 6 locomotives, a machine-shop, and commodious depot buildings have been erected. Other buildings are in process of erection. A ferry, with a first class side-wheel boat, has been established by the company on the Missouri river at Atchison for the accommodation of the road.

No report has been received from the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, and the Department has not been advised of the construction of any portion of the road.

The first section of the Western Pacific Railroad Company of California, twenty miles in length, was accepted on the 14th day of December last. No work has since been prosecuted.

Commissioners examined the road of the San Francisco and San José Railroad Company, and reported, under date of February 9, 1866, that, in its construction and equipment, it fully attained the standard of excellence prescribed by the Pacific railroad acts. The company made claim to an acceptance by the Government of the road and to bonds and lands. Their agent was verbally informed that an allowance of the claim, so far from being warranted, was, in the opinion of the Department, positively forbidden by law. Subsequently, on the production of additional papers, I received a communication, in which the views of the company on the subject were presented. After full consideration I was constrained to adhere to the conclusion previously announced. I stated, however, that if I had failed to recognize the just rights of the company Congress would, no doubt, at its approaching session, furnish an appropriate remedy. The subject is submitted for consideration.

The seventh section of the act approved July 1, 1862, seems to require, upon a map being filed designating the route of the Union Pacific railroad, or any branch thereof, that all the lands situate within fifteen miles on each side of the route should be withdrawn from preemption, private entry, and sale. This distance is increased to twenty-five miles by the amendatory act of July 2, 1864. One of my predecessors, however, directed that the order of withdrawal should not apply to the even-numbered sections reserved by the Government. The present practice, in conformity with this precedent, therefore authorizes a settlement on such sections, and, if they were surveyed at the date of settlement, recognizes the right of the settler to enter his claim either under the preemption or homestead laws. Conflicting opinions have been entertained by my predecessors as to the applicability to these lands of other acts of Congress prescribing the price of the even-numbered or reserved sections within certain prescribed distances from railways. The practice in this regard has not been uniform. The settler is now required on entering these lands to pay therefor the double minimum price. The acts of 1862 and 1864 are silent on the subject, and I respectfully submit that the question should be determined by the authoritative action of Congress.

In a recent preemption case contested by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California it was decided by the Department that the grant embraces the unsurveyed as well as the surveyed lands traversed by the route of these roads. An actual settler cannot, therefore, by settlement upon lands of either description which fall within the operation of the grant inaugurate a valid preemption right thereto after the local officers, pursuant to instructions, have withdrawn or withheld such lands. The proviso in the act of 1864, which declares that the grant shall not defeat or impair any preemption or other lawful claim has exclusive reference to such claims as had lawful inception at the date when the right of the road attached.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Company report that two surveying parties from Lake Superior and two from the Pacific coast have been actively engaged in the field. Explorations have been made, and the company are of opinion that a practicable route will be found. No portion of the road has been constructed.

The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, by a resolution of its board of directors, passed November 20, 1866, accepted the terms, conditions, and impositions of the act approved July 27, 1866, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast. A map was subsequently filed showing the location of the road from Springfield, Missouri, to the western boundary of that State. Upon the basis of this map the Commissioner of the General Land Office was directed to withdraw the lands. The eighteenth section of this act authorizes the Southern Pacific railroad, a company incorporated under the laws of the State of California, to connect with the Atlantic and Pacific railroad near the boundary line of California, and gives it a similar grant of lands. The latter company filed an acceptance of the terms and conditions of said act and a map showing the preliminary survey of the road from San Francisco to the Colorado river. The Commissioner of the General Land Office was instructed to withdraw the lands along the line represented upon that map.

The bridges across the Big Sioux river and the Vermilion, on the line of the wagon road between Sioux City and the mouth of the Big Cheyenne, have been completed. The James river bridge is unfinished. The balance of the appropriation is $1,250.

I have declined ordering a resumption of work on the projected road from the mouth of the Big Cheyenne to a point on the Niobrara road, in consequence of the hostile attitude of the Indians. The unexpended appropriation applicable to this road is $12,157 70.

The superintendent of the wagon road from Virginia City, Montana, to Lewiston, reports that it is impossible to grade and open such a road between those termini, and that a construction of one for a part of the distance would be of very little utility, as there is no local business. His efforts were directed to opening a track for the passage of loaded pack trains, that being the only method by which goods could be transported from Columbia river to Montana. There remains of the appropriation unexpended $8,025 25.

The architect in charge of the Capitol extension reports the completion of the portico of the south wing, and reiterates the opinion expressed in his previous reports that the central portico should be extended to correspond with those of the wings.

The skylights of the halls of the Senate and House of Representatives are, on account of their great dimensions, peculiarly sensitive to variations in temperature, which occasion frequent fractures. It is proposed to substitute for them others of the same description as those placed in the Supreme Court room.

There are serious objections to appropriating the committee-rooms in each wing as depositories of public documents. They are needed for the uses for which they were originally designed, and the floors and walls are being injured and defaced. It is desirable that arrangements should be made for storing the documents elsewhere.

The chambers occupied by the Supreme Court, law library, and Court of Claims, and the passages between the Senate wing and the Rotunda are warmed with improved heating apparatus; but the Rotunda and the old Hall of the House of Representatives are cold and often damp in winter, to the prejudice of the health as well as comfort of visitors. It is recommended that they be warmed in the same manner as the other passages.

If the Capitol grounds be extended to C streets north and south, as recommended by the architect, the Capitol would occupy about the centre of the enlarged area. It is universally conceded that the present limits are entirely too contracted. Justice to the adjoining proprietors requires that it should at an early day be determined to what extent their property contiguous to those limits will be needed for public uses. Squares numbered 575, 576, 687, and 688 were appraised in 1860, by authority of Congress, as a preliminary step to their purchase. All permanent improvement of the property was suspended. The Senate subsequently passed a bill providing for the purchase of the squares, but limiting the price thereof to the appraisal of 1860. The value of real estate in that portion of the city has since then greatly enhanced. In view of these facts the holders of this property have presented a memorial to this Department urging that three disinterested appraisers be selected—one by the Government, one by the property owners, and the third by these two; that Congress shall at once decide what grounds shall be purchased and direct their value to be fixed by the appraisers. The propriety of early legislative action is suggested.

The work upon the north portico of the Department of the Interior is nearly finished. An estimate has been submitted of the amount necessary for completing it and paving the street.

The amount paid to district attorneys, their assistants and substitutes, for the same period was $146,945 29; to United States commissioners, $50,643 53; to clerks of the courts of the United States 70,895 25; and for miscellaneous expenditures $157,837 67. Of this sum $66,092 97 were paid for rent of buildings for the accommodation of the courts and their officers.

By an act of Congress approved May 12, 1864, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to designate some suitable prison or penitentiary, and to contract with the authorities thereof for the confinement of persons convicted of crime, the punishment whereof is imprisonment, and sentenced by the courts of the United States in a district or territory where, at the time of such conviction, there should be no suitable prison or penitentiary. Under the authority so conferred my predecessor made contracts with the House of Correction at Detroit, and the Iowa State penitentiary, for the subsistence and employment of all convicts sentenced by the courts of the United States for the several Territories to imprisonment at hard labor. The former institution receives under the contract only such whose term of sentence was two or more years. Prisoners have been sent to these prisons from the Territories of Colorado, Nebraska, and Montana.

The act further provides that if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior the expense of transportation will exceed that of maintaining the convicts in jail in the Territory during the period of their sentence, it shall be lawful so to confine them. None have been sent from any of the other Territories, as, in the opinion of my predecessors, in which I concur, the expense of their transportation would far exceed the cost of maintaining them in jails in the Territories.

An act entitled "An act setting aside certain proceeds from internal revenue for the erection of penitentiaries in the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota," approved January 22, 1867, appropriated the net proceeds of the internal revenue of said Territories for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and the two succeeding years, for the purpose of erecting, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, penitentiary buildings in said Territories, at such place therein as had been or might be designated by the Legislatures thereof and approved by him. The amount to be expended therefor was not to exceed $20,000 in Washington Territory, nor $40,000 in either of the other Territories. The attention of the Governors of these Territories was invited to the subject, and they were requested, when the territorial Legislatures had passed an act designating the place for the erection of such penitentiaries, to transmit a duly certified copy thereof to this Department. Advices have been received only from Washington and Montana.

The ninth section of an act to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, approved April 19, 1864, (Statutes-at-Large, volume thirteen, page 47,) provides that fifty entire sections of land, to be selected and located by the direction of the Legislature thereof on or before the 1st day of January, 1868, should be, and they were thereby, granted to the State of Nebraska on her admission into the Union, in accordance with certain provisions of that act, for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for a penitentiary or State prison, in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe. The State was not admitted under that act. An act entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Nebraska," passed February 9, 1867, declares the State of Nebraska to be entitled to the rights, privileges, grants, and immunities, and subject to all the conditions and restrictions of said act of April 19, 1864. The proclamation of the President contemplated in the third section of the act of 1867 was issued March 1, 1867. Nebraska, on her admission to the Union, was entitled to the grant of lands for the specific purpose of erecting a State prison. Her admission occurring after the passage of the act of January 22, 1867, changed entirely her preëxisting relations with the United States. That act regarded her only as a Territory, and did not authorize the building of a penitentiary within the limits of a State.

I have been informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that the entire amount appropriated for building these penitentiaries in Washington, Colorado, Montana, and probably Idaho, has been received and is available for that purpose. In Arizona and Dakota the revenue is inconceivable, and the expense of collecting it so nearly exhausts the receipts that at the date of the Secretary's communication there was no available balance that could be applied to this purpose.

The Legislature of Washington passed an act designating certain persons therein named as a board of commissioners to superintend the erection of the penitentiary at such place as they might select in the county of Pierce, at or near the town of Steilacoom. By this act the entire control of the building is assumed by the Territory. It provides for the appointment of a person to superintend its erection, and authorizes the employment of the territorial convicts thereon, and for the payment into the treasury of the Territory of such sum from the penitentiary fund as their labor may be worth. The Legislature seems not to have been fully aware of the provisions of the act of Congress. The latter makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to approve the site, and provides that the buildings shall be constructed under his direction. No action can, therefore, under existing circumstances, be taken in the premises by the Department. It is presumed that the Legislature will amend its legislation so as to make it conform to that of Congress.

An act has been passed by the Legislature of Montana locating the penitentiary at Argenta, and appointing commissioners to select a suitable site for said penitentiary at that place. The commissioners have performed that duty, and have made a report thereof to this Department. At an early day steps will be taken to have the building erected in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress.

The warden of the District jail reports that on the 1st of November there were in his custody 113 prisoners, of whom 43 were white and 70 colored. During the year preceding that date 1,241 persons were committed, 79 of whom were convicted and sentenced to imprisonment at Albany. The present officers consist of a warden and 14 guards. The expense of the jail for said year, including the cost of transporting prisoners to the penitentiary at Albany, was $30,736 48.

Pursuant to the requirements of a joint resolution, approved March 2, 1867, I examined the public grounds deemed available for the purpose, and selected as a site for a new jail in the District the parcel of land known as reservation numbered seventeen, situated at the intersection of New Jersey and Virginia avenues, in the city of Washington. The "perfected plans" of the building were approved by a board of disinterested and competent engineers and architects, and public notice of the "letting of the contract" was given in the mode prescribed by law. After a careful consideration of the proposals I accepted such as offered the best terms to the Government. The contractors have executed bonds with acceptable security, conditioned for the faithful performance of their engagements, and I trust that the work may, without interruption, be prosecuted to an early completion.

Congress at its last session made no provision for the House of Correction for this District. Of the $12,000 appropriated at the preceding session $8,000 have been paid to the treasurer. Five thousand five hundred and five dollars and fifty-three cents have been expended by him upon the order of the trustees in repairing and furnishing the temporary building upon the Government farm, in an attempt to render it fit for the reception and detention, for the time being, of juvenile offenders. One thousand four hundred and fifty-seven dollars have been spent in the employment of a watchman and for other purposes, of which the report of the board does not furnish specific information. The trustees are of opinion that the building now occupied cannot be adapted to any permanent use. For the erection of one such as is required they suggest that an appropriation of $100,000 is necessary, and they request an additional appropriation of $25,000 to meet the current expenses of the institution. They have furnished no detailed estimate, and I submit the subject for consideration.

I earnestly invite attention to the views expressed in the last annual report of this Department touching the law directing the imprisonment of juvenile offenders sentenced by the Federal courts. A modification of its provisions is indispensable to give it practical effect in many parts of the country.

The Metropolitan police force consists of 238 men, of whom 6 are detectives. They made 20,075 arrests during the past year, 3,783 of which were of females, and 6,136 were of colored persons; 13,224 of the alleged offenses were against the person, and 6,851 against property; 12,167 of those arrested were unmarried, and 7,373 could neither read nor write; 971 were committed to jail; 334 gave bail for appearance at court; 200 were turned over to the military; 6,330 were dismissed; 1,967 were sent to the work-house, and 578 gave bonds to keep the peace. In 569 cases various light punishments were inflicted; fines to the amount of $38,098 45 were imposed in 9,128 cases. One hundred and eighty-four lost children were sent home; 3,473 destitute persons were furnished with temporary lodgings, and 181 were assisted or taken to the hospital. The detective force made 462 arrests; recovered stolen or lost property to the amount of $15,691 40, and performed other labors, which do not admit of record. The sanitary company of the police have been actively employed, and with evident advantage to the health of the city.

This Department suggested in the last annual report the expediency of creating a court for the trial of offenses of a minor grade, and the subject is again presented for consideration.

During the year ending 30th of June, 1867, there were admitted to the Government Hospital for the Insane 109 patients, of whom 88 were males. The whole number under treatment was 890, of whom 273 were males. The number discharged was 77, of whom 66 were males. The number of deaths was 33, of whom 19 were males. The whole number under treatment at the close of the fiscal year was 280, of whom 188 were males. More than half of these were from civil life. There have been 2,315 persons treated since the institution was opened, 1,064 of whom were natives. The receipts during the past year amounted to $101,871 95, and at its close there was a balance of $2,436 69 in the hands of the superintendent. Congress will no doubt cheerfully make the usual allowance for the support of the hospital. I recommend that an additional appropriation, for which an estimate has been submitted, be made for furnishing, lighting, and heating the unfinished part of the east wing of the main edifice, and for the purchase of land contiguous to the present grounds. The report of the Board of Visitors contains many interesting tables and an elaborate discussion of the proper treatment of persons afflicted with a peculiar form of insanity, of whom an unusually large number was admitted during the past year.

I have heretofore expressed my opinion of the admirable manner in which this institution has been conducted. Its present condition reflects the highest credit upon the accomplished superintendent and those associated with him in the administration of its affairs.

The Columbian Institute for the Deaf and Dumb is a private corporation. I referred to its history and its relation to the Government in my last annual report. I respectfully invite attention to the views which I then had the honor to submit.

In addition to the payment of the charges for the education and maintenance of the pupils entitled to admission on the order of the Secretary of the Interior Congress has advanced to this institution the sum of $264,040 87. There are now twenty-three pupils from the District of Columbia and three who are the children of persons in the military service of the United States. By the acts of February 16, 1857, and May 29, 1858, Congress agreed to pay annually $150 for the maintenance of each of such pupils. The directors requested an appropriation in gross for the support of the institution instead of the payment for such pupils per capita. The act allowing such charges should therefore be repealed, as Congress made the requested appropriation for that and the succeeding year, and it is confidently believed they will evince the same liberality for the ensuing fiscal year. At the last session the admission of ten pupils from the States to the collegiate branch of the institution was authorized on the same terms and conditions as those prescribed by law to the residents of this District. This provision was annexed to the appropriating clause granting $25,000 for the support of the institution and the purchase of books and apparatus. Nine pupils availed themselves of this privilege, thereby entailing an unexpected burden upon the resources of the institution. The directors request on this account an allowance of $3,000. I have submitted an item, therefore, in the deficiency estimates for the current year. During the last fiscal year three pupils died, eleven were dismissed, and eight admitted. In accordance with the direction of the board of trustees the president proceeded to Europe to examine similar schools in Great Britain, Prussia, France, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy. The result of his investigations is embodied in an able and interesting paper which accompanies the report of the board.

The claims of such an institution are of the most imposing character. I am, nevertheless, of the opinion that when Congress shall have liberally provided for the indigent deaf mutes who reside in this District, or are the children of persons actually in the military or naval service, it will have fully discharged its duty, if not exhausted its constitutional power over the subject. The present buildings are more than sufficient for the ample accommodation of the Government pupils. The board of directors, in addition to the school for the primary branches, desire to maintain a preparatory department, where the deaf mutes of the several States may be prepared for admission into the college proper. The studies in the latter will embrace as thorough and comprehensive a course of instruction in ancient and modern languages, and in the literary and scientific branches, as is furnished in the best American colleges. The indigent deaf mutes of the several States who are competent to profit by these advantages are to be maintained and instructed at the expense of the General Government. It certainly was not the original intention of Congress to provide for the gratuitous instruction of these afflicted persons. If unable to incur the expenses of an education, they should appeal to individual munificence or to that of the States in which they reside. The support of paupers is an appropriate subject of State legislation, and has never been regarded as falling within the province or constituting a duty of the General Government. The arguments advanced to justify Congress in furnishing educational privileges for the indigent deaf mutes of a State would equally require a similar provision for the blind or lame, or those who, without natural infirmities, desire collegiate instruction, but are excluded by their poverty from obtaining it.

Should these views be regarded as erroneous, however, and Congress deem it their constitutional duty to establish and maintain a national deaf mute college, the United States should control it, and be vested with a title to the grounds purchased by their means for its uses. The erection of buildings required for the accommodation of all the students who may desire instruction and maintenance free of charge will require a very large outlay, independent of the amount which, from time to time, must be advanced to meet the annual expenses of the institution. I take pleasure in adding that there is no other school in the country that surpasses this in the ability, zeal, and success with which the president and professors devote themselves to the intellectual and moral training of those committed to their care.

Congress, by an act approved June 1, 1866, incorporated the "Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum." It was established for the treatment of diseases peculiar to women, and as a lying-in asylum, in which board, lodging, medicine, and attendance should be gratuitously furnished to those unable to pay therefor. At the date of the report of the board of trustees there were seventy-one patients. During the past year 451 women obtained admission to the asylum, or received from it assistance and medical treatment. Congress on the 2d of March last appropriated $10,000 to aid in the support of this institution. The receipts from private donations were $3,280 71, and from patients $2,114 88, making an aggregate of $15,895 60.

Congress has always given its sanction, and whenever they could be properly bestowed, its pecuniary contributions to every well-considered benevolent enterprise adapted to supply the wants or promote the interests of the District of Columbia. This institution is a private corporation, and maintains the same relations to the Government as the Columbia Institution of the Deaf and Dumb. The trustees have, however, determined to submit an annual report to the Secretary of the Interior and to authorize upon his order the admission of patients whose indigence and helpless condition justify them in seeking eleemosynary aid. Few if any of the instrumentalities which the benevolence of the age has adopted to alleviate human suffering or minister to human wants present stronger claims to public sympathy than institutions of this description. Although in its infancy and with scanty means, this asylum has liberally extended to its beneficiaries skillful medical and surgical aid and that considerate attention which their peculiar condition required. In consideration of the good already accomplished and of the pressing necessity for extending the scope of its charities the directors strenuously urge that it should be established upon a permanent basis. As that object cannot be attained solely by private benefactions, they request an appropriation by Congress of $60,000 for the purchase of a site and the erection of buildings. I cordially recommend this request to favorable consideration; but if granted the organic act should be so amended as to secure to the United States a title to the real estate purchased, and an efficient control over the institution.

The respective departments and officers of the national Government, the executive departments of the several States and Territories, and the legally designated public libraries and educational institutions of the United States have been furnished, as far as practicable, with those copies of statutes, books, and congressional documents to which they are respectively entitled under existing laws. For a period of several years, on the completion of the printing and binding of the documents of a session of Congress, there have been delivered to the Department of the Interior 470 complete sets of those which are known as "House documents," and only 420 sets of "Senate documents;" thus placing in the custody of this Department, after the close of each session of Congress, fifty sets of "House documents" without an equal number of "Senate documents." The statutes which relate to the printing, binding, and distribution of complete sets of public documents need revision.

In closing this report, I should do injustice to the officers of this Department were I not to declare my high sense of the very efficient manner in which they have discharged their arduous duties. I respectfully refer to the views in regard to their compensation presented in the concluding portion of my last annual report, and earnestly invoke for them the favorable consideration of Congress.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDENT.

Report of the Acting Commissioner of Agriculture.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., November 25, 1867.

SIR: In consequence of the death of the late Commissioner, Hon. Isaac Newton, which took place in this city on the 19th day of June last, it becomes my duty by the terms of the organic act establishing this Department to submit to you a report of its transactions for the past year. In so doing it affords me great pleasure to be able to say that it has been a year of great productiveness and prosperity to the agricultural interest and to the country.

The discouragement resulting from the diminished fruitfulness of preceding years has been partially relieved by a recurrence of a fair measure of productiveness. Another assurance has been added to the universal teaching of the past, that seed-time is followed by the harvest as sure as day is preceded by the dawn. It is this certainty of results in proportion to the measure of judgment and industry employed that gives to husbandry its safety and stability, its freedom from preying anxieties, and its ability to supply the most pressing wants of the whole human family.

PROGRESS IN AGRICULTURE.

It is gratifying to note the evidences that are apparent even to the superficial observer of the increasing interest of our people in the advancement of agricultural science—of the quickened mental activities of farmers, as shown by the widening demand for agricultural books, newspapers, and the reports of this Department—of the disposition to experiment, test alleged improvements, and adopt labor-saving expedients—of the growing inclination to employ in agriculture money, business energy, and active enterprise, which are so successfully employed in other departments of business.

In nothing is this intellectual activity shown to be so manifestly beneficent to the agriculture of the present era as in the improvement of agricultural implements. In 1847 the number of agricultural patents granted was but forty-three; in 1863 it had increased to three hundred and ninety; in 1864 to five hundred and sixty-three; in 1865 to six hundred and forty-two; while in 1866 the wonderful increase to one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight was made; and during ten months of the present year the Patent Office has issued no less than one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven. Thus the number of agricultural inventions perfected yearly is now more than forty fold greater than twenty years ago. Already has this nation surpassed all others in the excellence and variety of its agricultural machinery. Partially represented as was our agriculture in the recent World's Exposition of Industry, at Paris, and almost ignored officially in the national recognition of that great exhibition, our honors plucked from the field of European competition were almost exclusively industrial, and largely agricultural. So successful have been our farming implements in repeated contests on European soil that their rapid introduction into foreign markets is only impeded by the greatly increasing demand at home. These improvements are rapidly revolutionizing the agriculture of the West, and reducing to the lowest minimum ever attained the proportion of manual labor employed in its operations. As an instance the reaper, first doing the labor of a half dozen, then a half score of men, is supplemented with a self-raker, which does the work of others still; and now, further to facilitate and economize the harvest work, the same machine is furnished with apparatus for instantaneous binding of the sheaves. And the further this labor saving progresses the higher the wages of harvest workers, the broader become the harvest fields, the greater are the profits of the farmer, and the more extensive become the garnerers of the world.

Coincident with this application of mechanics to agriculture, systematic and enlarged business aptitudes have also sought alliance with this noble art. Farms of thousands of acres have been managed with greater skill, a more economical adaption of means to ends, and with a larger margin of net profit than many others of eighty acres. The maxim "cultivate fewer acres and cultivate them better" is a safe one for farmers who can only be induced to cultivate better by a reduction of the area cultivated, but it will be found that the larger the farm, within the capacity and means of the farmer for good tillage, the better and cheaper it may be tilled. Yet it is true of the mass of farmers who only employ the labor of their own hands, that the concentration of that labor upon a small area is their highest assurance of success.

It is a fact that cannot escape the attention of the observing that men of culture and wealth are taking an interest in agriculture, giving to the world the benefit of their experience and research, and pursuing their vocation with a view to scientific results as well as profit. It has ceased to be a custom to select the dolt of the family for the business of farming. It is becoming apparent, even to the unintelligent, that agriculture involves principles underlying many sciences, and natural phenomena too deep for science to fathom; that it requires, in a merely practical view, a farmer to be something more than a plowman—a machinist, to understand the construction, management, and care of farm machinery; a carpenter, to repair implements and manufacture many fixtures of the farm; a bookkeeper, to keep an accurate record of the outgo and income, experiment, profit and loss; a merchant, to know how and when to buy and sell cattle, or dispose of the products of his labor; and a banker, to discover when drainage and fertilization will prove a better investment for surplus profits than five-twenties or railroad stock. In view of all these evidences of the progress and of the expanding capabilities of our agriculture I take pleasure in commending this great interest to the favorable consideration of Congress, believing they will deal with it in a spirit of liberality becoming a great nation. The continued manifestation of governmental interest in this industry is assumed from the magnificent grants of public lands for "such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and mechanic arts," the subject of which is fully set forth in the fourth section of said act, as follows:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all moneys derived from the sale of lands aforesaid by the States to which the lands are apportioned, and from the sales of land scrip hereinbefore provided for, shall be invested in stocks of the United States, or of the States, or some other safe stocks, yielding not less than five per cent. upon the par value of said stocks; and that the moneys so invested shall constitute a perpetual fund, the capital of which shall remain forever undiminished, (except so far as may be provided in section fifth of this act,) and the interest of which shall be invariably appropriated by each State which may take and claim the benefit of this act to the endowment, support, and maintenance of at least one college where the leading object shall be, without excluding other scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts, in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the practical and liberal education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions in life."

The details of organization of these institutions in aid of scientific and intelligent husbandry has been wisely left to the control of the States, a majority of whose people are interested in the pursuits to be benefited and therefore not disposed to permit these liberal donations to be misapplied. It is gratifying to note the increasing interest in agricultural education which is evinced in discussions of the various plans of organization, and to discern the gradual crystallizing into form of the crude views at first entertained, all leading to the confident belief that a sublime development of practical industrial education, however slowly accomplished amid embarrassments and discouragements, will at length be acknowledged one of the crowning glories of America.

RETROGRESSION.

While adverting to these evidences of progress in American agriculture it is proper to drop a word of dissatisfaction, and even utter a note of warning, in view of the improvidence and reckless waste which is stripping the fairest fields of their wealth of fertility, exposing them to the constant action of the elements, and subjecting them to an annual drain of the same constituents, none of which are ever returned to the soil. The Department estimate of the average production of wheat in Ohio last year was about four bushels per acre; the State statistics, so far as returned, made the yield scarcely three bushels. None will doubt that it is more owing to bad culture and want of drainage than to the severity of the season that the product did not average twenty bushels. Every new western State is remarkable for sounding reports of great crops of wheat, and the same States, in a very few years, are equally remarkable for reduction in yield of wheat, increase of insects, and prevalence of disease.

The freshest areas in this culture east of California will scarcely yield an average of twelve bushels per acre the present year. A systematic rotation, some attention to fertilization, greater care in the selection of seeds, better tillage, and more thorough culture will alone prevent deterioration in products and real values of farm property. This stigma upon American agriculture may be attributed in part to the cheapness of western lands, the original price of which bears so insignificant proportion to their intrinsic value that the owner erroneously deems it cheaper to remove to new lands than to sustain and increase the productive capacity of his present farm. One result of this fatal error is the removal westward, year by year, of the center of wheat production, thus adding transportation and other charges to its ultimate cost, threatening to make difficult the future supply of our population and to render export impossible.

If we shall be able to produce our own supply of breadstuffs, with a surplus sufficient to prevent the operations of speculators, a failure to supply a foreign demand need occasion few regrets among the true friends of agriculture, for grain growing for export is unquestionably the most illusory and least remunerative of agricultural operations; and its worst feature is the exhaustion of the soil which inevitably follows its culture in undue proportion to stock-raising. Western farmers are finding true the remark of the late Hon. Henry L. Ellsworth, made twenty years ago, that "the profits of wheat appear well in expectation, on paper, but the prospect is blasted by the appearance of insects, bad weather in harvesting, or transportation to market, or last, a fluctuation in the market itself;" and many are inclining to the belief of Lord Brougham, "that grazing countries are always the most prosperous, and their population the most contented and happy."

THE POLITICS OF AGRICULTURE.

The modest reserve and quiet independence of our rural population have heretofore barred the great interest of agriculture from its proper prominence in the legislation of the country; while other interests, more active and clamorous, with the advantages of association, abundant means, and concentrated effort, have often secured special protection at the expense of the farmer. Unfortunately this disinclination to self-seeking and lack of ambition for public station result too generally in the selection from towns and cities of national legislators from other vocations, some of whom have little knowledge of the peculiar wants of the farming class, and many others may have connection with other interests that may be brought into frequent antagonism with those of agriculture. Farmers are learning their power and are beginning to exercise it in self-protection, if not for their own advantage; and their interests are now more clearly understood and more fully represented in legislative councils than at any former period.

RAILROADS.

The railroad interest has secured, among other favors and franchises of the Government, grants of public land, amounting to one hundred and eighty-four million acres, in aid of lines extending in all directions, to the borders of civilization, under plea of furnishing facilities for travel and the transportation of the fruits of agriculture and the products of mines; and the results have been seen in extended settlement and expanding cultivation; yet growing stronger, disregarding the general welfare, these monopolies have combined in their tariff of rates to discriminate unfairly against farm products, and to require much the larger portion of the value of the crops for their transportation to market. So onerous is this burden that the cost of transportation of wheat from Chicago and other western centers to the Atlantic cities is greater than from San Francisco, via Cape Horn, to the same points. It is hoped that the attention of rural voters to this subject may ultimately correct this evil which proves so serious a drawback to their industry; but it can only be accomplished by untiring vigilance over State legislation and by securing the enactment of laws that shall restrain these corporations from the absorption of the entire products of the farm, instead of allowing them to control the legislation of the country against the best interests of the people, and especially to the detriment of the consumer, who is made to pay tribute to this combination which breaks down a fair competition incidental to all other classes and associations in the business of life.

In this connection I desire to express the hope that Congress may devise and perfect some plan for facilitating the early construction of a ship-canal for the transportation of western products from the lakes to the ocean, or for the building of a double track freight railway, open to all, forwarding on equal terms and supported by an equitable system of tolls.

THE WOOL INTEREST.

The wool-growing interest, involving a capital of hundreds of millions and underlying the prosperity of American agriculture in a degree scarcely appreciated by farmers themselves, has been saved from threatened annihilation by the action of Congress in placing a duty upon the foreign article equivalent to the internal taxation endured by the wool-growers, though not until the commercial class, taking advantage of the tardy progress of the measure, had inflicted a heavy blow in the introduction of more woolsens in a single year than were imported in three years of the late war. It is to be hoped that a premium will never again be given to foreign production either of wool or woolsens by imposing a higher tax upon American than upon foreign wool-growers, and that the present moderate and harmonious adjustment, barely saving the two classes of producers from loss and consumers from becoming the ultimate prey of foreign monopolists, may long be undisturbed, even by the threat of agitation for repeal. Our wool production is now more than equivalent to two thirds of a full supply, and with an increase of worsted wools, already initiated and progressive, and more attention to the finer varieties of clothing wools, there will scarcely be occasion for any imports whatever, with the exception of coarse carpet styles, complete provision for which exists at a nominal rate of duty. It is a manifestly false system of political economy in a nation with a continental domain having unmeasured resources of annual growth running to waste that sends abroad for the raw materials of manufacture, and it is scarcely less unwise in a teeming population, demanding various employment, to send from the country these unwrought productions which we are amply able to manufacture for the markets of the world.

SOUTHERN AFFAIRS.

The unsettled condition of industry of the southern States requires the encouraging aid and friendly recognition of the Government to restore the people to a state of prosperity and self-reliance, so essential to the development of the great resources of that section. There is every evidence of a fixed and determined purpose of the people to adapt themselves to the changes produced by the result of the late war. I am confident that the change in the labor system of these States, radical as it has been, will ultimately prove a great and permanent benefit, which none will be more ready to acknowledge than those affected by it; and that the least apprehension of an attempt to revive the system of slavery is entirely groundless. By no means can a settled and well-grounded conviction of this fact be so readily realized as by promptly and emphatically disabusing the minds of the freedmen (at present unsettled and disturbed) of anticipations of dividends of confiscated estates and the delusions of political preferment. With ample protection of his civil rights and privileges, the increasing demand for his labor, at remunerating wages, will make his presence not only acceptable but desirable; antagonism of capital and labor will cease, and the laborer of to-day, with the accumulations of his industry and economy, becomes the proprietor of to-morrow.

A portion of the people have been influenced by more potent causes for discouragement than political failure and the change in the relations of labor. Reduced to almost hopeless poverty by the exactions and vicissitudes of war, many thousands of the poor of these sections, during the early part of the present year, suffered great distress and absolute want, which excited the sympathy of the benevolent in the North, and secured food supplies for temporary relief.

The distribution, under the special appropriation of $50,000 to be expended in seeds for these States, was promptly and fully made, in accordance with the views and intentions of Congress, through special agents sent through the southern States, postmasters, prominent citizens, and the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. Although authorized late in the season, the information received by the Department has been entirely satisfactory as to the result produced by this liberal and timely donation.

These States possess decided natural advantages over the northern and western sections in their ability to produce every article which may be grown in the higher latitudes, with the almost exclusive advantage of producing cotton, hemp, rice, sugar and other products of the lower temperate zone. With longer shore lines than any other section of the continent, facilities are furnished for coastwise and inland navigation to the whole tide-water area, which is endowed with a climate peculiarly adapted to market gardening, with forests abounding in the most valuable timber and waters teeming with edible fishes and crustacea. Florida is destined to be a winter garden, yielding market supplies to northern cities without a risk of competition, and oranges, figs, and olives and other fruits of semi-tropical climes. Between tide-water and the lower slopes of the mountains is a region producing wheat of a better quality than that of any section north of it, the entire range of farm products in great profusion, and such fruits as apples, cherries, and grapes with certainty and success. The mountain region, almost unappropriated and unknown, at an elevation varying from fifteen hundred to six thousand feet, is the great grazing section of North America, sufficient to furnish abundant pasturage through the year to millions of cattle and sheep. These mountain slopes are generally free from surface rocks, covered with forest growths interspersed with grassy glades, and fertile to their summits. In bodies of thousands of acres these pastoral areas await the advent of the dairyman, the wool-grower, and the herdsman, at prices not exceeding those of the public lands of the distant West; and even on the eastern aspect of the Blue Ridge, in proximity to railroads and near to great markets, whole counties together have little more than ten per cent. of their territory in a state of nominal improvement.

There are grounds for assuming, also, that this must ultimately become the great wine-producing section of the country; for observation and experience fully attest that the higher, colder, and more humid latitudes will not ripen to perfection the wine-producing grape. It being now a well-settled fact that wine can be made in this country equal to the best that can be imported, we have only to select a region of our great country where the climate is perfectly adapted to grape culture to be independent of the world for our wine supplies.

Examination of the following table will show the extent of land not included in farms in the several States: [See table at the foot of next page.]

It will be seen that the southern States vie with the distant West in extent of unoccupied lands. They show an area, not in farms, amounting to nearly three hundred million acres, nearly two thirds as much more "unimproved" in farms, and less than seventy-five million nominally improved, which is but thirteen per cent. of the whole, and not half of this in actual cultivation. It is safe to say that little more than five per cent. of the area of the South is annually cultivated.

An imperative and immediate necessity of rescinding the cotton tax must be apparent to all. The reduction of more than half the value of this fiber, in connection with labor contracts and other expenses upon the basis of high prices, is disastrous and disheartening in the extreme. A tax of twenty per cent. ad valorem upon one of the raw products of agriculture which has not paid the expenses of culture must be destructive to all enterprise and effort in the producer, and yet many a cotton-planter will fail to realize a more cheering state of facts at the close of the year's operations; and it will stimulate the efforts of the British cotton supply association, which have increased the India yield by the aid of the war and our own taxation nearly fourfold in eight years, and that of Brazil at about the same rate. Ten years ago the contribution of the United States to the European supply was fully four fifths of the total amount; now it is considerably less than the receipts from other sources. During ten months of 1867 the imports into Great Britain were as follows:

It is not probable that a monopoly in cotton production will be regained; nor is it desirable that it should. The cotton of this country is of superior quality, and should be manufactured largely where it is grown; any surplus of the raw material would then command remunerative prices abroad, and the cotton interest would still be independent of foreign combinations, and far more prosperous than in the time when planters made more purchases annually than the proceeds of their cotton would cover. The factories would make a demand for the labor of women and children, and furnish markets which would stimulate a widened range of agricultural production, making requisite and inevitable a largely increased population, and ultimately resulting in larger crops of cotton than in the boasted days of our cotton supremacy.

The solution of the labor question in the cotton States is anxiously awaited by the people. The recent radical change of the system of labor has necessarily been attended with irregularities, especially in the working of large plantations, and has led to disappointments and discouragements; and the operations of the future will undoubtedly be conducted on a smaller scale by a larger number of proprietors. No body of laborers of whatever race or degree of intelligence, if free to contract for their own service, can be held in one locality or one branch of industry or prevented from attempts, however weak or unsuccessful, to assume the part of proprietor. The negroes of the South have exhibited such restlessness and evinced a similar ambition to the annoyance of the contractors for their labor; yet in many cases their employers have accorded to them a character for stability and industry that was scarcely to be expected. Time alone will settle these disturbed conditions; and patience and experience in adjustments to new circumstances on the part of employers and employes will aid materially in the settlement.

The introduction of Asiatics to meet the requirements of cotton production is to be deprecated, not only because such labor is unskilled and far inferior to negro labor, but it will add to the complications produced by the jealousies and prejudices of races widely differing in character, taste, and traditional customs. The assumed disadvantage in the presence of one inferior race cannot be neutralized by the introduction of another.

As a result of the doubt relative to the action of the negro the white man has undertaken the solution of the labor question, and is successfully producing cotton, both by coöperative and individual enterprises, proving to the world that the Caucasian can labor without detriment to health under a southern sun, and laying the foundation for universal industry and general thrift.

There is unexampled activity throughout this section in search of new branches of production, and the fostering care of the Government in aiding the acquisition of new fruits, grasses, and fibers, and in furnishing information calculated to facilitate experiments, correct injurious misapprehensions, and render these activities successful, will be rewarded by the return of prosperity to a great section and in a development that will enrich the country and astonish the world.

STOCK IMPORTATION.

The cattle-plague, or rinderpest, having almost, if not entirely, disappeared in Europe, it will become necessary to repeal or modify the law prohibiting the importation of cattle, no cases having appeared in England for some weeks, and notice having been given that no more reports will be made. Stock-growers of this country desire, after so long a prohibition of importation, to avail themselves of an opportunity for judicious selection of favorite strains of blood and to secure the result of recent improvements.

DEPARTMENT OPERATIONS.

The limited appropriations heretofore made to this Department have merely enabled it to inaugurate a plan of operations designed to further the interests of intelligent husbandry and protect it in its economic and political relations with other industries. Constantly accumulating evidence of the interest awakened among farmers in these efforts in behalf of agriculture attests the vitality and utility of this branch of the Government service. Special information, involving scientific, technical, and practical knowledge, is sought with great avidity by individuals and associations, and by directors and promoters of emigration and official boards of agriculture in foreign countries, and the monthly and annual reports are yearly received with increasing appreciation.

The system of crop estimates, initiated as an experiment, and furnishing only approximate results in the absence of a complete census of production, have proved sufficiently reliable to excite the ire of speculators, whose purposes are frequently foiled by their publication. In the case of cotton, the only product of which an annual enumeration is attainable, the estimate of last year, of one million eight hundred and thirty-five thousand bales, was strikingly verified.

Great benefits would result from a census by the General Government, taken in periods of five years instead of ten as heretofore; and it is to be regretted that there is not in each State a provision for an annual census of the principal farm products, and that in many of those States which have taken some action in that direction there should be so much neglect and failure in the enumeration required on the part of local officers, many of whom appear to regard the duty as a labor to be performed or neglected at pleasure. The schedules to be filled should be as nearly as possible the same in each State; the duty of the officer should be made imperative, and public opinion should be brought to enforce the requirement. The efficiency of these officers differs much in different States, but the returns of the States most reliably and completely reported fall far short of the figures of the United States census of the same period. If those statistics could be made equally and reasonably complete and accurate in the several States, and the returns should be promptly communicated to this Department, the results might be of exceeding interest and value.

Believing that a more direct and intimate communication between this Department and the people, through the medium of competent representatives, would be conducive of good results, securing cooperation in official labors, comparing results of agricultural processes under different circumstances, noting the progress of improvement at exhibitions or special meetings, and communicating in lectures or conversations the results of official investigations, I have taken occasion, to some extent, thus to employ the services of heads of divisions in observations having reference to the greater efficiency of their several branches of the Department, and for which they were especially qualified by specific and technical training. I am satisfied that good has resulted both to the Department and to agriculture by this representation.

I take the liberty to suggest that the compensation fixed by law for the services of the head of this Department is entirely inadequate, and would recommend a liberal increase of the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture. Believing that the time has arrived for providing suitable and appropriate residences for the heads of the different Departments of the Government upon portions of the public reservations, I would recommend that a suitable house be erected for the accommodation of the Commissioner of Agriculture, in the vicinity of the Department buildings. The social position of chief officers of a great nation, if properly maintained, requires outlays greatly disproportionate to the compensation now allowed by law, and with the short periods of official service and frequent changes incident to our system of Government, no one can enjoy the comforts of a home without great pecuniary sacrifice.

THE SEED DISTRIBUTION.

The distribution among the people of new and valuable seeds and plants appears to be one of the principal objects of Congress in the annual appropriations to the Department. This has become a most delicate and difficult duty, for what is new in one country may not be valuable or useful in another; the most valuable of seeds or plants may be in some sections of our own country the most common varieties, yet unknown in other sections; and those which would be of the utmost value in one latitude might be worthless in another. Experience has fully shown that a change of seeds and plants from one section to another has greatly improved the yield and quality. These results can only be attained by repeated and constant tests of the adaptation of the several varieties to soil and climate. To introduce or to distribute seed upon any other principle would be useless. The charges occasionally heard of the distribution of worthless and common seed are caused in many if not in all cases by inexperience or neglect or want of skill in their culture; for the singular anomaly is often presented by unfavorable reports from some and the most favorable and flattering accounts from others of the results of the same seeds in the same locality. That seed may not occasionally be mislabeled in the millions of papers put up and annually distributed would be to claim a marvelous exemption from mistakes. New varieties are obtained whenever satisfactory evidence has been adduced that they have been properly tested; and the people are now enjoying the benefits of many new and valuable products which have been introduced into the country through the agency of this Department. The crops of sorghum alone would more than compensate for all the money expended by the Department for seed.

The total distribution of seeds for the year amounted to 1,426,637 papers. Of this number 352,000 were distributed through Senators and members of the Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Congresses; 88,482 through agricultural and horticultural organizations; 164,953 to corps of statistical correspondents, in acknowledgment of valuable gratuitous services; 299,975 to individuals upon letters of members of Congress, or upon personal application, or in answer to letters from individuals; and 521,227 to the southern States, under the special appropriation for that purpose.

PROPAGATING GARDEN.

The distribution of plants from the experimental and propagating gardens from January 1 to May 6, 1867, amounted to 42,123, principally through Senators and members of Congress, reaching every State and Territory in the country. The articles have consisted mainly of the smaller varieties of fruits, of which the grape has been in large proportion. The introduction of the best varieties of this valuable fruit, their adaptation to various climates, and for special purposes, has been prominently kept in view. The main purpose of the garden, that of testing the respective merits of new varieties, is still kept strictly in view, and all new varieties are procured as early as practicable, and the knowledge gained concerning them embodied in the Department reports.

The Department building having been located upon the reservation now used as an experimental farm, an arrangement of the grounds in a manner more in keeping with the surroundings and new improvements becomes not only proper but necessary. As a farm it has long been evident that the area is altogether too limited for the requirements of the nation; seeds become intermixed, and the products consequently are unreliable. Even with regard to testing the merits of various products, the limited space that can be afforded to each is such as to render an accurate estimate impossible. I would therefore suggest that the reservation be devoted to the purpose of forming an Arboretum Americanum, or grand national arboretum, where the unequalled arboreal wealth of this country may be collected and planted in accordance with a strict botanical system, and at the same time exhibit the highest degree of landscape effect. This has long been a desideratum with scientific men here as well as in foreign countries, and its importance has very frequently been impressed upon the Department. A specimen of every tree and shrub capable of existing in the climate would here find its appropriate place, forming a scientific school of instruction to the botanical student and a valuable resort to the artist and to all lovers of the beautiful in nature. Plans for this important improvement are now in course of preparation by Mr. Saunders, the horticulturist of this Department. This disposition of the grounds will be hailed with satisfaction, and will be a work of time more than expense, calling for no alteration of present surface more than may be necessary in providing sufficient roads and walks for the inspection of the plants.

THE EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

At the experimental farm tests of seeds of cereals and garden vegetables, both foreign and domestic, have been successfully continued, though the area cultivated is quite too limited for the best results. Of the five hundred and seventy-six varieties included in the experiments sixty-three were of winter wheat, sixty-six of spring wheat, five of winter rye, sixteen of spring rye, twenty-one of barley, twenty of oats, ten of corn, twenty-nine of grass seeds, three of sorghum, nine of sugar beets, thirty-five of peas, thirty-six of potatoes, and twenty-seven of melons. Many of these varieties, as was expected, proved undesirable or unsuitable, while others succeeded well, warranting good results in their introduction and cultivation. A statement of results in detail will be found in the report of the superintendent of the farm.

The spring wheat was a failure, almost necessarily, in this climate; it is proposed that tests of this grain be made by individuals in the North and Northwest the coming season.

The winter wheat was prostrated by heavy storms late in spring, and therefore attained scarcely three fourths of the highest yield of the previous year, yet a Tasmanian variety produced at the rate of thirty-seven bushels per acre, weighing fifty-nine pounds. The Tappahannock yielded at the rate of twenty-eight bushels, weighing sixty-five pounds.

The New Brunswick oats attained the best results—thirty-six bushels, weighing thirty-nine pounds.

The greatest yield of rye was at the rate of forty-two bushels, weighing fifty-eight pounds.

Of the thirty-six varieties of potatoes, including the most noted and popular of this country and Europe, the results of last year are substantially repeated. Those standing highest were the Goodrich, Orono, and Samaritan. This season the Samaritan drops to sixth on the list in point of productiveness, and the first three are the Goodrich, Orono, and Colebrook seedling, yielding at the rate of about three hundred bushels per acre.

THE CHEMICAL LABORATORY.

In the chemical laboratory of the Department analyses and tests have been constantly made to ascertain the value and utility of various products, fertilizers, minerals, and fibers, the benefits of which the country are reaping. Correspondence has been held and information and advice given on making sugar from sorghum. Attention has been given to a solution of the question as to the extent of territory of the United States in which the sugar beet may be grown for the manufacture of sugar, and in what respects the climatic peculiarities of the country, between 35° and 45° north latitude, compare with the beet-growing districts of northern Europe. An extended series of examination has been made upon beets grown on the experimental farm of the Department, the results of which have not been tabulated and compared. The work will soon be completed, and the results will appear in the report of the chemist. These analyses have been made at different stages of growth, with reference to the effect of fertilizers, and to ascertaining the time at which the largest amount and best quality of sugar may be obtained. In view of the great success of the beet-sugar manufacture in France and Germany and the supply of a large portion of Europe with an unexceptionable article of sugar, there is every reason to anticipate an early conquest of all the difficulties which confront the experiment in this country. Already, at Chatsworth, Livingston county, Illinois, the business has been introduced on an extended scale, with every prospect of ultimate success.

STATISTICS.

The work of the division of statistics has been various and laborious. A mass of ascertained facts of foreign and domestic agriculture, with approximate estimates of current productions of the staples of the farm will be found in the report of the statistician, condensed and systematized, with careful analyses and explanatory illustrations and comments.

For several years the estimates of production included only the northern States until people had become familiarized with aggregates representing the production of only a portion of the country. The incorporation of the southern States in a grand summary of agricultural results was doubly difficult in view of the cessation of all regular agricultural order during the war, and its shattered and uncertain status on the return of peace. The wonderful agricultural progress of the distant Pacific States has complicated the difficulties of accurate compilation of the statistics of production. Yet, with the aid of a large corps of zealous and intelligent reporters in all sections of the country, valuable results have been achieved in this branch of the Department.

In comparison with 1860 the table of numbers and prices of farm stock exhibit a decrease of six per cent. in horses, with a slight increase over the exhibit of the previous year. The heaviest loss is shown in the South; the most rapid recuperation in the West. Prices of horses have retrograded less than values of other stock during the year.

Cows appear to be increasing more rapidly than any other horned cattle, as a result in part of the success of the associated dairy system.

Sheep, it is claimed, have nearly doubled in numbers since 1860, increasing from twenty-three to more than forty million, and their wool from sixty to one hundred and fifteen million pounds.

There has been an increase in swine since 1860, principally in the West.

The farm crops of the present season, with some exceptions, have been more abundant than those of last year. The wheat crop, for three years comparatively small, has been generally good, with a large average, and a moderate yield. Including the southern and Pacific States, the returns, when fully complete, will probably show a total aggregate of more than two hundred million bushels.

While corn promised a large yield, with an increased acreage, there were serious local losses, principally in the Ohio valley, which will tend to reduce the estimates.

Cotton is yielding better than last year and will probably produce an aggregate of more than two and a half million bales.

For estimates of the principal products reference is made to the statistical report.

THE DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

The new building for the accommodation of the Department was not contracted for until after the adjournment of the session of the Congress in July last, in consequence of the protracted illness and subsequent death of the Commissioner. The contract was awarded to the lowest bidder, Francis Gibbons, jr., esq., of Baltimore, with whom an agreement providing for the furnishing of materials and erection of a building, upon the plans submitted to Congress, and upon which the appropriation therefor was made, was duly executed on the 2d day of August, 1867, copies of which, with ample security for the performance of the same, are on file in the Comptroller's office, Treasury Department. The erection of the building was promptly commenced and is now ready for the roof, and proceeding with entire satisfaction toward completion. The promptness and energy with which the contractor has thus far progressed with the work warrant the confident belief that it will be completed under the terms of the contract and within the appropriation by the 1st day of March next or very soon thereafter.

Further appropriations will be necessary for heating, furnishing, fixtures, and grading of grounds and walks around the building, the cost of which has been submitted in the estimates for the expenses of the Department for the next fiscal year, and will be duly presented to Congress for consideration.

There has been paid on account of the building, upon estimates of work done and materials furnished, $48,720 89. The remainder of the appropriation is applicable to the payment of further estimates, and the ten per cent. reservation, under the contract, upon the completion of the work; and I have no reason to doubt that it will be sufficient for those purposes.

FINANCES.

The declining health of the late Commissioner greatly interfered with the prompt rendering of his quarterly accounts during the last year of his administration, none having been rendered for that period until after I had assumed control of the Department, since which time they have been duly submitted to the proper accounting officer of the Government. In the settlement all moneys drawn by him from the Treasury appear to be accounted for, but during the several years of continual appropriations for nearly the same objects drafts were made upon certain items of appropriations and paid out upon others in amounts beyond the appropriations to these objects, and in order to a proper adjustment of his accounts upon the books of the Treasury Department a deficiency appropriation to the amount of $8,606 42 should be made.

There are also in addition to the above various unpaid bills for seeds and other materials, contracted for and used by the Department during his administration, amounting to $35,392 35, to meet which the appropriations were inadequate, and for which a further deficiency appropriation should be made. A schedule of such debts have been submitted to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of being presented to Congress in the usual manner.

The appropriation for the purchase of the Glover Museum was promptly applied to that object, and Mr. Glover has duly transferred his collection to the Government. This collection continues to be the center of attraction to all visitors, and its usefulness as an economic museum can scarcely be overestimated. Additions of interesting objects continue to be made, all sections of the country contributing specimens of agricultural products, minerals, and manufactures, or whatever may be considered useful and illustrative of the growth and enterprise of the country.

In reference to the present financial condition of the Department, there has been expended out of the appropriation for the current fiscal year $65,118, leaving a balance of $113,902 to meet the demand for the remainder of the year, which is considered sufficient for the purpose.

In conclusion I desire to acknowledge my indebtedness to the several heads of division of this Department for their valuable assistance and faithful cooperation in the peculiar and responsible duties devolved upon me, and also to note their zeal and ability in the management of the specialties confided to their charge. The same commendation is cheerfully accorded to the clerks and employes of the office for their general faithfulness in the discharge of their various duties.

JOHN W. STOKES,

Acting Commissioner of Agriculture.

To his Excellency ANDREW JOHNSON, President.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. G. S. BOUTWELL, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 5 and 6, 1867.

The House having under consideration the following resolution, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors—

Mr. BOUTWELL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In opening this cause to the House I shall confine myself to a concise presentation of the views which the occasion imperatively demands at my hands, giving no rein whatever to those efforts and forms of speech which other men in similar circumstances have freely employed with great propriety and power.

The gravity of the occasion is unusual; leading us, as it ought, to exercise great care in speech and action, but not inducing us to swerve in any manner from the line of duty. It is one of the incidents of public life that public men are called to take responsibility; but it is one of the achievements of life to meet and bear successfully such responsibility when tendered by circumstances or events.

It is not strange that a sensitive, a conscientious public opinion shrinks from a proceeding so solemn in its character, the end of which man cannot foresee. In one scale they place all the present material and political interests of the country and in the other the project for the removal of a President who has fifteen months only of official life. If this were a full statement of the case, and there were no consequences of evil likely to follow, I certainly should not hesitate to yield to the suggestion which invites us to leave the President where he is. In the first place, the impeachment of the President does not involve any neglect of the questions and subjects to which the attention of the country is chiefly directed. In any event Congress will have time to deal with all these questions, and it will deal with them undoubtedly in a manner acceptable to the country. On the other hand, if the conclusion of the majority of the committee be correct, we are charged with a grave duty concerning the country in all its material and political interests during the present Administration, and furnishing an example affecting favorably or unfavorably its fortunes in all future time.

The public mind is influenced also by the vast powers and supposed evil character of the President; and the larger these powers are assumed to be so the more do the people dread a contest with a man whose capacity for wrongdoing even they have learned to respect. There is also a small class, but not an unimportant class, of the community who are attracted by the courage and persistency of the President's course. They have seen him carry on for two years a contest, apparently an unequal contest, with the legislative department of the Government in which there has been a two-thirds majority against him; but such has been his success that it is not strange that they now anticipate for him a speedy, decisive victory. And even his enemies must admit that he has exhibited talents and courage in a bad cause which would have rendered the truth triumphant in every part of the land.

Others have received the impression that the suspension of the President would follow his impeachment by this House. It certainly will not be out of place for me in this connection to present the views I entertain on this subject. After much deliberation I cannot doubt the soundness of the opinion that the President, even when impeached by this House, is still entitled to his office until he has been convicted by the Senate; and I have reached that conclusion in the presence of many difficulties which in my judgment are incident to the question.

I know it may be said that it is an extraordinary feature in the Government that the President of the United States, impeached by this House, and arraigned and on trial before the other, should still have command of the Army and the Navy and remain in possession of the vast emoluments, power, and patronage of office. There are grave difficulties in the way of this view. But if, on the other hand, it be the doctrine that the President of the United States is to be temporarily suspended from his office whenever the House of Representatives, by a majority of one, shall choose to prefer articles of impeachment against him, it is perfectly apparent that a mere majority might take out of the hands of the Executive, for any purpose that might seem to it fit, the power which by the people and under the Constitution had been confided to him. It is worthy of notice, also, that the House having the management of the prosecution might prolong the trial for the purpose of controlling the Government. Therefore, after careful examination, I reach the conclusion that whatever may be the difficulty in the way of prosecuting the trial while the President remains actually in control of all the powers of the Government, it is a difficulty incident to the question, and a difficulty which we cannot remove.

I refer briefly to what seemed to me to be the duty of the committee; and in this connection I will also speak of what I understand to be the discretion of this House incident to its great authority under the Constitution, having in its hands the sole power of impeachment. The committee had no discretion. It was called by the order of the House under the Constitution to investigate the conduct of the President and to ascertain whether he had committed impeachable offenses. It was the duty of the committee to report its conclusion upon its conscience and best judgment. But in this House the jurisdiction is larger. This House has the sole power of impeachment. Its action is not subject to revision. Therefore it follows unquestionably that, in the exercise of its best judgment and conscience, it may give heed to the great rule of municipal and public life, that the law takes no notice of trifles. While the committee might feel compelled to bring here as a result of their investigation a conclusion based upon unimportant but technical violations of the laws of the land, amounting, in their judgment, to crimes and misdemeanors, it still would be in the power of the House to say that these matters are too unimportant to attract and engross the attention of that great tribunal, the Senate of the United States, acting in its highest character as a branch of the Government.

I also assume that this House may go still further. It may say, notwithstanding it shall appear from the record and from the evidence that the President is guilty of impeachable offenses of so high a character that under other circumstances it would be compelled to proceed to his trial and conviction, that the evil of attempting to correct them in the manner appointed by the Constitution is greater than submission to the continued evil of his administration. And this statement comprehends, I think, the entire powers of this House. It acts in its judgment upon the evidence first, but upon its conscience in its regard to public policy whether it will proceed or not. I very much doubt, however, the power of this House to censure the President as an independent proposition, though I cannot doubt its power to declare, if it choose so to do, that the President is guilty of impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors, but that upon considerations of public policy it is not for the present wise to prosecute those charges to trial and final judgment.

It was found by the investigation, as has been very fully set forth in the reports submitted to the House by the different branches of the committee, that this inquiry involves the determination of questions of law on which, in my judgment, the whole proceeding depends. If the theory of the law submitted by the minority of the committee be in the judgment of this House a true theory, then the majority have no case whatever. If, on the other hand, as I believe, the opinion entertained by the majority of the committee be a true view of the law, then I am unable to avoid the conclusion that the President is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, subjecting him to impeachment according to the authority of the Constitution. I have therefore felt it to be my first duty, if not my chief duty, in the discussion of this matter, to present to the House the view of the law entertained by the majority of the committee as fully, as carefully, but as concisely, as I am able to present it.

The attention of the committee was directed almost constantly to the nature and extent of the power of impeachment as it exists under the Constitution of the United States, and to the practice of the British Parliament from the earliest historical times to the commencement of the present century. The experience of Great Britain affords much instruction and something of warning in reference to proceedings by impeachment, but it does not furnish precedents which ought to control or in a large degree to influence the House of Representatives acting under the Constitution of the United States.

There are four provisions of the Constitution relating to impeachment, and I present them together for easier reference, and that the views I entertain may be more readily compared with the law upon the subject:

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers; and shall have the sole power of impeachment."—Art. II, sec. 3, par. 5.

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present."—Art. II, sec. 3, par. 6.

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law."—Art. II, sec. 3, par. 7.

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."—Art. II, sec. 4.

It is apparent from these provisions that the power of impeachment is not vested in the two Houses of Congress for the purpose of punishing criminals, but for the sole purpose of removing from and rendering ineligible to office those persons who by their crimes or misdemeanors may be unfit for a particular public trust, or, in extreme cases, for any public trust whatever.

It is true that a judgment by which an officer who is charged with an act tainted with criminality is removed from office, and in some cases declared to be disqualified to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, is in its very nature a severe punishment; but that punishment is an incident of the proceeding and not its object. The object is to secure the country against the presence of the offender in any place of trust or power. If the judgment of the Senate be regarded as punishment, then the seventh paragraph of the third section of the first article of the Constitution, which provides that "the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law," would be wholly inconsistent with the nature of our institutions.

This phrase of the Constitution has been drawn aside, as I think, or rather torn from its legitimate connections and office for the purpose of furnishing a prop to the doctrine that those acts that are indictable, and those alone, are impeachable offenses.

The true and different meaning of this phrase is easily discovered. Its office was to change the common law practice of England. By that law a person convicted by the House of Lords upon a proceeding by impeachment could plead that conviction and sentence in bar of an indictment in a criminal court for the same offense. The reason of this is also apparent. The judgment of the lords carried a punishment with it entirely distinct from removal from office. Indeed in England removal from office was an incident or consequence of the proceeding, while its main object, as in ordinary criminal trials, was the punishment of the guilty party. Hence, when a man had been convicted and sentenced through the process of impeachment, and was subsequently arraigned in an ordinary criminal court, he put himself upon the common law maxim, incorporated substantially as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in these words:

"Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb."—Art. V of Amendments.

The framers of the Constitution foresaw when they limited the sentence in cases of impeachment to removal from office and inability to hold office, that persons so convicted and sentenced, if afterwards arraigned upon an indictment would plead the judgment of the court of impeachment as a bar to the proceeding. Hence they employed affirmative and specific language controlling the English practice. This clause of the Constitution furnishes adequate support to the position I hold that impeachment is not in this country, as in England it is, a mode by which crimes are punished.

The proceedings, under the Constitution of the United States, for the impeachment of a public officer are essentially and fundamentally different from proceedings in cases of impeachment under the system of Great Britain; and this difference impairs materially, if it does not utterly destroy, the value of the English cases as authority in the United States. Under the English system the accused is subjected to trial in the House of Lords by processes analogous to those of an ordinary criminal court, with the singular and apparently unreasonable difference that he may be condemned by the voices of a majority merely of his triers, not less, perhaps, than twelve in number, while in a criminal court the accused cannot be sentenced and punishment inflicted unless the jury are unanimous in pronouncing him guilty.

Further, under the English system the House of Lords fixes the penalty, which may be death, imprisonment, loss of property, of office, or only the smallest fine in money. The accused can have no previous knowledge of the penalty to which his acts have exposed him. By the process of impeachment in England greater power is exercised by the House of Lords than is or can be exercised by the Senate of the United States and any criminal court, if the authority that each possesses is considered as vested in one body.

There are five manifest and important distinctions between the English and American systems in the nature and scope of the proceeding by impeachment:

1. In the United States the object is not the punishment of the offender, but security against his presence as a public officer.

2. In the United States the power of impeachment is limited to public officers; while in Great Britain a private citizen may be subjected to the proceeding.

3. In the United States the accused cannot be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the Senators present, while in England judgment follows if a majority of the lords present pronounce the accused guilty.

4. In the United States judgment cannot extend further than removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, while in England the party convicted may be deprived of office, estate, and life at the will of a majority of his judges.

5. In England judges of the courts, since the time of William III, may be removed by the king upon an address by both houses of Parliament. This power does not exist under the Constitution of the United States.

In view of these manifest and important distinctions between the English and American systems the cases furnished by the practice of Great Britain possess but little importance as authority in America.

It follows naturally and necessarily from the distinctions stated that in this country a proceeding by impeachment is not a criminal proceeding. The absence of the party charged does not delay the trial. He cannot challenge the triers. Whoever is qualified as a Senator is thereby authorized to act as a judge. The Government is not bound to provide counsel or to pay the expenses of witnesses for the accused; nor can he avail himself of those technical rules relating to the verbiage of the charge established by law and usage in purely criminal proceedings, by whose aid the felon often passes from the dock or the prison and escapes the punishment due to his crimes.

An address to the throne would be resorted to in those cases where the matter for which the removal of a public officer is sought is free from color or taint of criminality. This power does not exist under the Constitution of the United States; and inasmuch as its exercise depends necessarily upon the concurrence and action of the Executive it could not be resorted to for the removal of the Executive.

It is unnecessary, and consequently unwise, to anticipate the result should the House and Senate ever be called to consider the case of an imbecile or insane executive or judicial officer. Mr. Johnson is mentally competent for the performance of his official duty, and the only question is whether he has done acts that legally and technically are "high crimes and misdemeanors" in the sense in which those words are used in the Constitution. Recently, in a more formal manner than ever before, the position has been taken that civil officers, including the President and Vice President, are not liable to removal by impeachment unless proved guilty of acts that are declared to be indictable high crimes or misdemeanors by the written statute laws of the United States.

In the presence of the fact that this technical theory of the law is a shield, operating though not designed to protect Mr. Johnson from responsibility for acts which, as I believe, are high crimes and misdemeanors, according to the principles of the English parliamentary common law of crimes, I am led to make a full statement of my views of the constitutional powers of the two Houses of Congress for the removal of civil officers by the process of impeachment.

In entering upon this branch of the subject it is not out of place for me to state that when I speak of the English common law of crimes, or the criminal common law of England, I mean that law as it was administered by Parliament in cases of impeachment. This law was based upon the municipal criminal law, if it did not in all particulars correspond to it. Inasmuch as the process of impeachment under the English system was a criminal proceeding solely, and in that particular, as already shown, distinguished from the process by impeachment under our system, it naturally happened, as in the case of Lord Melville, that the lords declined to proceed when the law judges gave the opinion that the charges did not set forth an indictable offense.

It is also true that the principles of the English criminal courts in regard to the admission of testimony, the nature of the proof, and the rights of the accused, prevail in courts of impeachment in this country; and this rather from the necessity of the case than by virtue of the Constitution or by specific authority of law.

This practice shows how generally and thoroughly woven into our system of jurisprudence is the English common law, and how it is only by violent wrenching of the whole system that we escape from its control. We learn the meaning of the words "pardon," "reprieve," "jury," "bribery," "crime," "cruel and unusual punishments," "good behavior," "felony," "breach of the peace," and even of "impeachment," all words used in the Constitution, by reference to the English common law, and this, by the necessity of the case, sanctioned by the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, and upon the ground that without such reference the Constitution would be inoperative and void; and yet when we propose to go to the same fountain of wisdom for the meaning of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" we are told that these words are exceptions.

When, as is admitted, every other word used in the Constitution and known to the common law is interpreted by the common law, I ask for the authority, the constitutional authority, by which these words are made exceptions to this great rule, incident to our public life, sanctioned by the Constitution, and necessary to the existence of the Government? Is it to be found in the fact that these are general words and not specific? The minority of the committee, as I understand them, so assert and maintain. They admit that if following the words "treason" and "bribery" were the names of specific crimes, as arson, burglary, and murder, there would then remain no doubt that the commission of a crime so specified would constitute an impeachable offense. How does the case now differ? It would have been impossible to enumerate every crime and misdemeanor in the Constitution, yet those acts which by the English common law were "high crimes and misdemeanors" were perfectly well known. Blackstone in successive chapters has specified and named the acts which were "crimes and misdemeanors" under the general head of public wrongs. He has divided them into five principal classes, described the acts that were criminal, and given to each its name.

First, crimes against justice, among which are mentioned bribery, perjury, barratry, maintenance, champerty, and other crimes well known to the common law and the laws of all civilized countries as crimes against justice. Secondly, he enumerates under the head of "crimes and misdemeanors" "crimes against peace," such as riots, carrying weapons, challenges, &c. Thirdly, he mentions "crimes against trade," such as smuggling, owling, &c. Fourthly, "crimes against health," such as selling unwholesome provisions. Fifthly, "crimes against the police or the public economy of the State," as bigamy, polygamy, nuisances, &c. Can there be any doubt that when our ancestors went to the common law of England as it was laid down by Blackstone and selected treason and bribery as two great public political crimes, thus indicating the nature of the crimes which by the Constitution they intended to make impeachable, and drew from Blackstone, or even older authorities than Blackstone, the intelligible and well understood phrase, "other high crimes and misdemeanors," they intended to include those crimes which were as well known to the common law of England as were the crimes of treason and perjury?

Blackstone also divided crimes and misdemeanors into such as are more immediately injurious to God and His holy religion; such as violate or transgress the law of nations; such as especially affect the king; such as more directly infringe the rights of the public or commonwealth taken in its collective capacity; such as in a peculiar manner affect or injure individuals. Under this last head he mentions "murder," "mayhem," "abduction," "rape," "kidnapping," "false imprisonment."

Every lawyer and statesman in England and America understood precisely what offenses were embraced by the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors."

The division and enumeration made by Blackstone was familiar to every court in England and America, for the English common law prevailed in all the thirteen colonies. Moreover, in the last days of royal power in Massachusetts, its House of Representatives, upon the motion of John Adams, had impeached Chief Justice Oliver of "high crimes and misdemeanors." And yet we are now told that these solemn, majestic, omnipotent words of the common law were used by the lawyers, patriots, and statesmen of America in the most important part of the Constitution without any present meaning, destined to wait, and wait, for Congress to breathe into them the breath of life.

Nor can any enumeration in words meet all the cases of misdemeanor in office which would be the subject of impeachment, and Congress, after a struggle with difficulties which could not be mastered, would finally flee for refuge and security to some general phrase, and can any be suggested better than the comprehensive and well understood language employed by the framers of the Constitution?

Again, I say the view of the majority of the committee does not rest solely upon contemporaneous history or ancient authorities. The Supreme Court and the admissions of the minority of the committee fully sustain our position. The word "bribery" is not defined by the Constitution, and the minority admit what the Supreme Court with the clearest reason has declared, that for the definition of a common law word used, but not defined in the Constitution, we must refer to the common law and there ascertain its meaning. The chairman goes to the common law for the meaning of the word "bribery." The general and specific meaning of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" was as well known to the common law as was the meaning of the word "bribery." The decision of the Supreme Court accepted by the minority of the committee refers us necessarily to the common law for the meaning of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors," and that meaning it must be admitted is not in any degree doubtful. Indeed "bribery," as we have seen from Blackstone's arrangement, is one of the crimes embraced under the head of crimes against justice in his classification of crimes and misdemeanors to which we are compelled to go to ascertain the meaning of the word "bribery," and wherein also we cannot avoid seeing the names and learning the nature of the other offenses included under the general phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors."

In pursuing this branch of inquiry I again refer to the provisions of the Constitution, already quoted, from which several distinct powers are derived:

1. The House of Representatives has "the sole power of impeachment." The word impeachment was known to the common law of England; and by the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States every common law word or phrase used in the Constitution is to be interpreted and defined by the rules and definitions of the English common law.

By that law the power of impeachment included inquiry, the presentation of articles of impeachment, and the prosecution of the case before the Senate to final judgment, and all this at the will of the House of Representatives.

2. The Senate has the sole power to try all impeachments, and the sixth paragraph of the third section of the second article makes provision in detail for the organization of the Senate as a special judicial tribunal.

3. The Constitution enumerates the persons who may be the subjects of impeachment, to wit: "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States," and by necessary implication excludes all other persons.

Thus does the Constitution create a court of impeachment, composed of a body charged with the duty of examination and prosecution, a tribunal to hear and decide with the jurisdiction as to persons prescribed and limited, leaving nothing whatever to future legislative discretion and action.

4. The Constitution specifies the acts which render the "President, Vice President, and all civil officers" liable to impeachment, to wit: "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

The open and remaining questions are: did these words have a specific and understood meaning when the Constitution was made, or did the men who framed it, the conventions and the people who ratified it, leave these words without meaning or force?

Is it not certain from the nature of the case, from the provisions adopted, from the language employed, that it was the design of the framers of the Constitution to create a tribunal with all the needful qualities and attributes of a court, including a statement of the extent and limits of its jurisdiction and authority in regard to persons and offenses, leaving nothing to legislative discretion and wisdom?

The meaning of the words "treason, bribery, high crimes, misdemeanors," as used in the common law of England and America, was then perfectly understood. The legal and general literature of both countries is replete with evidence in support of this statement. Could the framers of the Constitution have used these words without ascribing to them any meaning; and if any meaning was ascribed to them what meaning except that ascribed to them wherever the English language was spoken or English laws and customs prevailed? But the view I am maintaining is not dependent upon inference, reason, or contemporaneous history even, for a careful consideration of the clause in question shows that legislative action would prove entirely impotent. Assume that it is not possible to impeach the President or any civil officer for any offense of which he may be guilty, unless such offense shall have been declared previously by a law of the United States to be an indictable high crime or misdemeanor. But will it be assumed further on the one hand that Congress may by law declare an act to be a misdemeanor which, according to the principles of the common law, contains no one element or quality of a crime, and upon the doing of the thing inhibited proceed to impeach and remove the President of the United States from his office?

The statement of the proposition furnishes its own refutation, and all just men must admit that in the presence of the provision of the Constitution now under consideration there is no power in Congress available for the purpose of laying a foundation for proceeding by impeachment to declare an act a crime which would not be so upon a judicial application of the principles of the English common law.

On the other hand, can Congress by law declare that acts which by the common judgment of mankind are crimes are relieved from all taint and impurity and that civil officers who may be guilty of those acts are free from responsibility? Can the constitutional powers of a court established under the Constitution, and for the highest purposes known to it, be thus annulled by an act of Congress and the court itself rendered utterly incapable of performing its only function, and that function essential to the existence of the Government? Is it possible in the nature of the case that the Fortieth Congress by law may limit and control the House or Senate of a succeeding Congress in the discharge of duties imposed upon them by the Constitution? Is it not, then, true, if the power to legislate on the subject be admitted, that Congress from the necessity of the case can neither enlarge nor limit the meaning or scope of the words used in the Constitution?

Honest and constitutional legislation would present the subject finally as it now appears in the Constitution itself. Those acts, and those only, would be "high crimes" which are so according to the principles of the English parliamentary common law of crimes; and those acts would still be "misdemeanors" which are so by virtue of the same principles. Thus, upon an analysis of the subject, are we compelled to fall back upon the phraseology and substance of the constitutional provision we are considering; and most certainly we should be compelled by experience to fall back upon its substance and phraseology if legislative action were undertaken.

In continuing the analysis we see yet more clearly how futile and dangerous all attempts to legislate upon this subject will in the end prove. Treason is one of the offenses for which civil officers are liable to impeachment. This crime is defined by the Constitution, and will it be contended that it is in the power of Congress to enlarge, limit, or in any degree to qualify the jurisdiction of the Senate when sitting as a court for the trial of the President or other officer charged with that crime?

If it be said that the circumstance that this crime is defined in the Constitution has deprived Congress of the power to legislate upon this branch of the subject, and that its authority is therefore limited to "bribery and other high crimes and misdemeanors," it may be stated in answer that the Constitution did not create the crime of treason, but simply limited the definition of the crime to a single offense; while by the common law of England it included several distinct offenses. It should be observed, however, that by the English law every form of treason was a crime or misdemeanor, and while by the Constitution of the United States only one of these forms is declared to be treason the other acts still rest in the class of crimes and misdemeanors.

Bribery was an offense as well known to and as well defined by the common law of England at the time the Constitution was framed as was the crime of treason. The phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" had been in use in the courts and in the books of England for centuries.

Legislative wisdom is and ever must be incapable of rendering the meaning of these words more certain than it is when subjected to the principles which lie at the foundation of the English common law. The Constitution makes the President and all civil officers liable to impeachment if guilty of bribery; is it to be assumed that this power in the Constitution was to remain dormant until Congress by law should declare what bribery is, and what acts are acts of bribery; and also provide that bribery as defined by law shall be an indictable offense? If it had happened, for example, that an aspirant for the Presidency at the organization of the Government had bribed a sufficient number of electors to secure his own election and to defeat the choice of the people, would the country have been compelled to submit to the administration of such a man for four years, or would the House of Representatives and Senate have proceeded under the authority conferred by the Constitution to impeach, to try, and remove him from office? And be it remembered that although bribery is named in the Constitution it was not, when the Government was organized in 1789, an indictable offense, which the minority of the committee say it must be before it can be impeachable. The Government was in existence from the 4th day of March, 1789, to the 30th day of April, 1790, before a crimes act was passed, and during that time neither treason nor bribery was indictable by law in any court of the United States. Will anybody say in view of this provision of the Constitution that our fathers would have sat silently and submitted to the administration of a man who was elected by bribery, but whose offense was by no law of the land indictable?

Still further, it is constitutionally impossible for Congress to declare that certain offenses are crimes and misdemeanors everywhere and under all circumstances within the territory of the United States. For example, the power of Congress to provide for the punishment of the crime of murder is limited to the forts and arsenals, to the District of Columbia, and to the Territories of the Union. Upon the theory that those offenses only are impeachable which are made crimes by the laws of the United States a civil officer might be guilty of murder within the jurisdiction of a State where the crime is not and cannot be punishable by any law of Congress, and the House and Senate would have no power to arraign, try, and remove him from office. Practically it would be found impossible to anticipate by specific legislation all cases of misconduct which will occur in the career of criminal men. At the present moment we have no law which declares that it shall be a high crime or misdemeanor for the President to decline to recognize the Congress of the United States, and yet should he deny its lawful and constitutional existence and authority, and thus virtually dissolve the Government, would the House and Senate be impotent and unable to proceed by process of impeachment to secure his removal from office?

The theory I am combating is virtually the end of the Government. It offers substantially free license to executive and judicial officers. Legislative wisdom has not yet attempted to declare by statutory provisions what acts executive and judicial officers may not lawfully do, but when such wisdom shall have been exercised for a century and exhausted the President of the United States may examine and avoid all statutes of restraint or inhibition, and then fearlessly and successfully usurp power, oppress the people, encourage discord, promote rebellion, corrupt public officers, humiliate and disgrace the nation by multitudinous acts of wrong, and there will be neither redress nor relief. The theory that we must look to the statutes of the United States alone, and that the President and other officers, as long as they do not violate the criminal statute laws of the country, may do any act or thing, however detrimental to the public interests, however contrary to the public morals, however heinous in its nature, and still retain their offices, is a theory so at variance with civilization, with the principles of law, and with the existence of the Government, that it ought not to receive our support or countenance unless the language of the Constitution imperatively requires us to yield to its authority.

The history of the Government shows conclusively that this theory was not entertained by its founders. The men who framed the Constitution were for a quarter of a century in the Government of the country, and they never took one step or suggested that one step should be taken for the purpose of rendering the power of impeachment of practical value if it be true that no act, however base, dangerous, or criminal, is a crime or misdemeanor in the contemplation of the Constitution unless it has been previously so declared by an act of Congress and made an indictable offense. The omission upon their part to legislate upon the subject, with the knowledge they had as to the meaning of the Constitution, would have been criminal in character if they entertained the opinion that legislation was necessary in order to render the power of removal by impeachment of any practical value for the preservation of the liberties of the country.

I now call the attention of the House to the opinion of the Supreme Court given in 1812 touching the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, in which they held that the courts have no common-law criminal jurisdiction, and that such jurisdiction cannot be taken unless authorized by an act of Congress. The opinion was given in a case which was not fully argued, and it was not the unanimous opinion of the court. But I have no occasion to question its soundness. The courts of the United States under the Constitution have no common-law criminal jurisdiction, and for the reason that the Constitution has not conferred it upon them. The Senate of the United States, as I maintain, as a high court of impeachment, has the power to deprive the President or any civil officer of his office who has been guilty of treason, bribery, or other high crime or misdemeanor, because the Constitution has conferred this power upon the Senate. The Supreme Court in the case referred to held that the law must first make an act a crime, affix a punishment to it, and declare the court that shall have jurisdiction of the offense. All these conditions are satisfied in the provisions of the Constitution by which the Senate is constituted a tribunal with the sole power to try impeachments. The officers liable to impeachment and the offenses rendering them so liable are distinctly specified.

Is it not reasonably certain that if the words "bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors" were not to be interpreted by the rule of the common law their meaning would have been limited in the Constitution itself, as was done in the case of treason, or that specific authority would have been given to Congress to act on the subject? The simple addition to the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" of the words "as may by law be prescribed" would have settled the question in favor of the theory which gives to Congress authority to change the powers of the Senate as a court of impeachment according to its own changing opinions.

I rest firmly in the conclusion that the phrase "bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors" is used in the Constitution in accordance with and subject to the rule of reason, which lies at the foundation of the English common law. This rule is that no person in office shall do an act contra bonos mores, contrary to good morals; and subjecting the provisions of the Constitution concerning impeachment to that rule the result is that neither the President, the Vice President, nor any civil officer of the United States can lawfully do any act, either official or otherwise, which in a large, a public sense is contrary to the good morals of the office he holds. Misconduct in office, misbehavior in office, misdemeanor in office, are equivalent terms. It follows also that the scope of the rule of the common law is not to be ascertained by reference to cases which have arisen either in Great Britain or in the States of the United States where the English common law of crimes exist, however numerous such cases may be. The principle of the English common law furnishes not only the foundation for the cases which have arisen, but for others that may arise and to which the same great principles of law must be applied.

This principle has been elucidated by the most eminent writers of England and of this country, and it is especially recognized, applied, and elaborated by one of the great jurists of modern times. I refer to Chief Justice Shaw, of the supreme court of Massachusetts.

By the Constitution this House may determine the rule of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two thirds expel a member. But are we to sit here without authority to protect ourselves until those acts which amount to disorderly behavior are enumerated in the laws of the country or by the rules of the House? Our security is first in the reason and conscience with which we are individually guided and warned; and then in the reason and conscience of our judges applied in the light of the principle which lies at the foundation of the common law, municipal, public, and parliamentary. Upon the view of the Constitution which I present and maintain honest public officers are safe in all their rights. In the nature of the case, a civil officer, guided by his conscience and judgment, will do no act which the Senate of the United States upon its conscience and judgment, and by a two-thirds majority of the members present, will pronounce a high crime and misdemeanor. On the other hand, the theory that I aim to refute seems to me to be fraught with danger to civil officers and with peril to the Government.

With this view of the law I turn now to the authorities, and then I shall pass briefly over the precedents which the history of this country furnishes. The great authority upon impeachment, whose writings are, indeed, the result of all English experience, all English law, and all English learning upon the subject, is that of Wooddeson, who was the first English law writer, as far as I know, who treated the subject of impeachment upon broad, general grounds of public policy. A part of the extract which I now read has been furnished, I believe, in both the majority and minority reports of the committee, but I enlarge the quotation as stating more fully the ground upon which I stand in the opinions I entertain upon this question. He says:

"All the king's subjects are impeachable in Parliament, but with this distinction: that a peer may be so accused before his peers of any crime, a commoner (though perhaps it was formerly otherwise) can now be charged with misdemeanors only, not with any capital offense. For when Fitzharris, in the year 1681, was impeached of high treason, the lords remitted the prosecution to the inferior court, though it greatly exasperated the accusers. Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the Commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper and have been the most usual ground for this kind of prosecution.

"Thus, if a lord chancellor be guilty of bribery or of acting grossly contrary to the duty of his office, if the judges mislead their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions, if any other magistrate attempt to subvert the fundamental laws or introduce arbitrary power, these have been deemed cases adapted to parliamentary inquiry and decision.

"So where a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admiral to neglect the safeguard of the sea, an ambassador to betray his trust, a privy councillor to propound or support dishonorable measures, or a confidential advisor of his sovereign to obtain exorbitant grants or incompatible employments—these imputations have properly occasioned impeachments; because it is apparent how little the ordinary tribunals are calculated to take cognizance of such offenses, or to investigate and reform the general polity of the State."—Wooddeson's Lectures, edition of 1792, Dublin, vol. 2, lecture 40.

In accordance with this learned and clear opinion of the great commentator upon the English law are the authorities on this side of the Atlantic, beginning with Hamilton, who in the sixty-fifth number of the Federalist says, speaking of the power of the Senate in the matter of impeachment:

"The subjects of its jurisdiction are those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust."—Federalist, No. 65.

Nathan Dane, in his Digest of American Law, says:

"Judge Chase in his defense under the first article of impeachment contended that no civil officer of the United States can be impeached except for some offense for which he may be indicted at law; and that no evidence can be received on an impeachment except such as on an indictment at law for the same offense would be admissible. This ground taken by the respondent occupied a large portion of the arguments on both sides; but his counsel did not insist on this ground, and most clearly it was not tenable. It was agreed on all hands that he was charged with misdemeanor in office; that a misdemeanor in office and misbehavior in office mean the same thing."

"Suppose the President of the United States were to attempt to influence the votes of members of Congress upon a particular question, and should promise them offices, he would be impeachable clearly, but surely not indictable."

"Now, what is good behavior in office is certainly a very general and indefinite question, not defined by statute, Constitution, or adjudged cases, nor can it be in the nature of things; but what is good behavior or not in office must ever essentially depend on the actions of the officer and circumstances of the particular case, too numerous and various to be reduced within any known in the proper sense of the expression."—Chap. 222, articles 8 and 9.

It follows from these authorities that those acts are especially impeachable offenses which affect the welfare or existence of the State, or render the officer unfit for the discharge of his duties. It does not follow that every act which is a crime at law is therefore impeachable, or that impeachable offenses are indictable.

Chief Justice Story says, in his various paragraphs on this subject:

"However much it may fall within the political theories of certain statesmen and jurists to deny the existence of a common law belonging to and applicable to the nation in ordinary cases, no one has yet been bold enough to assert that the power of impeachment is limited to offenses positively defined in the statute-book of the Union as impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors."

Again:

"It seems to be the settled doctrine of the high court of impeachment that, though the common law cannot be the foundation of a jurisdiction not given by the Constitution or laws, that jurisdiction, when given, attaches, and is to be exercised according to the rules of the common law, and that what are and what are not 'high crimes and misdemeanors' is to be ascertained by a recurrence to that great basis of American jurisprudence."

And he adds to this that—

"The power of the House to punish contempts, which are breaches of privilege not defined by positive law, has been upheld on the same ground; for if the House had no jurisdiction to punish until the acts had been previously ascertained and defined by positive law, it is clear that the process of arrest would be illegal."—Vol. 2, sec. 797.

Again he says:

"The offenses to which the power of impeachment has been and is ordinarily applied as a remedy are of a political character. Not but that crimes of a strictly legal character fall within the scope of the power, but that it has a more enlarged operation, and reaches what are aptly termed political offenses, growing out of personal misconduct, or gross neglect, or usurpation, or habitual disregard of the public interests in the discharge of the duties of political office. These are so various in their character and so indefinable in their actual involutions that it is almost impossible to provide for them by positive law. They must be examined on very broad and comprehensive principles of policy and duty."—Vol. 2, sec. 764.

If this concise and clear paragraph illustrating the law of impeachment had been written in view of the facts which we are now called to consider, it would not have more clearly set forth in its general language the offenses of which the majority of the committee complain.

Again he says:

"Congress have unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct." * * * "In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried no one of the charges has rested upon statutable misdemeanors."—Sec. 799.

That was the opinion of Mr. Justice Story, writing about the year 1830, when the cases of Blount, of Chase, and of Pickens were before him and known to him. He says that no one of the cases of impeachment which had then been tried rested upon statutable misdemeanors.

I here close, Mr. Speaker, the authorities, and turn to the cases which the history of this country has furnished for the purpose of sustaining by a distinct reference thereto the doctrine which Judge Story maintained, and which is set forth in the report of the majority of the committee.

The first case is that of William Blount, a Senator from the State of Tennessee in the Congress of the United States. He was impeached by the House of Representatives upon the ground that he had excited the Indians of the Southwest against the Government of the United States, or at least to ally themselves through the agency of other persons with foreign Powers in such a way as to promote a rupture with Spain. The charges against him rested entirely, or almost entirely, upon a letter written by himself and upon the testimony of a person who was in a certain sense his confidant and agent; but I believe upon a careful examination of the whole of the testimony it amounts to this only, that there was probable cause to believe that he had some purpose to alienate the Indians of the Southwest from the Government of the United States, and indirectly to interfere with the neutrality laws of 1794. But however that may be, whoever reads the charges made by the House of Representatives will be satisfied that they did not set forth an indictable offense under any law of the United States. What did the House of Representatives do? It impeached William Blount of high crimes and misdemeanors on the 3d day of July, 1797. The Senate, upon the question of law being raised whether a Senator was in such a sense a civil officer as to be liable to the process of impeachment, held that he was not a civil officer, and therefore the case was disposed of upon a point of law.

But what did the Senate do? By a vote of twenty-five to one they expelled William Blount from the Senate, and in the resolution of expulsion it was expressly declared that he had been guilty of a high misdemeanor. Therefore in the case of William Blount we have the judgment of the House of Representatives of 1797 and the judgment of the Senate of 1797 that an offense which, as set forth in the charges preferred by the House, was not an indictable offense, was nevertheless a high misdemeanor. Judge Story, in commenting upon the action of the Senate, says:

"It may be supposed that the first charge in the article of impeachment against William Blount was a statutable offense, but on an accurate examination of the act of 1794 it will be found not to have been so."

The next case is that of Judge Chase, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Convention that framed the Constitution of the United States, a learned lawyer, present, making his answer and managing his own cause before the Senate. Upon the eighth article there were nineteen votes in the Senate for conviction and fifteen for acquittal. He had been impeached by the House of Representatives for high crimes and misdemeanors. By a majority of the Senate, but not by the requisite two thirds majority, it was declared that under the eighth article he was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. What is set up in the eighth article? If the House will bear with me I think it would be not uninteresting to listen to the concise statement of the grounds on which the House of Representatives, in 1804, proceeded to carry the case of Judge Chase before the Senate of the United States.

The eighth article is in these words:

"And whereas mutual respect and confidence between the Government of the United States and those of the individual States, and between the people and those governments, respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony without which there can be no public happiness, yet the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties and dignity of his judicial character, did, at the circuit court for the district of Maryland, held at Baltimore in the month of May, 1803, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury then and there assembled, on the matters coming within the province of the said jury, for the purpose of delivering to the said grand jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland against their State government and constitution, a conduct highly censurable in any, but peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, moreover, that the said Samuel Chase, then and there, under pretense of exercising his judicial right to address the said grand jury, as aforesaid, did, in a manner highly unwarrantable, endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland against the Government of the United States by delivering opinions which, even if the judiciary were competent to their expression, on a suitable occasion and in a proper manner, were, at that time, and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extra-judicial, and tending to prostitute the high judicial character with which he was invested to the low purpose of an electioneering partisan."

That was the eighth of the articles preferred in 1804 by the House of Representatives of the United States against a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and he did not, upon the record, venture to risk his case upon the question of law. He took the judgment of the Senate upon the whole question, the law and the fact combined; and by a vote of four only escaped conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors upon the article, which I have now read, from the first to the last words thereof.

The next case was that of Judge Pickering, of New Hampshire. I will read the fourth of the articles upon which he was convicted. I will say here, what perhaps I might have said elsewhere, that we stand, not upon the doctrine that indictable offenses by the statutes of the United States are not under some circumstances and when of a certain character impeachable, but if we find in the proceedings of our ancestors that on any occasion in any array of articles against an offender there is a single article which does not set forth an indictable offense, and the party was convicted upon that article, it sustains our position as fully as though none of the articles set forth an indictable offense. Therefore it is with great confidence that I call the attention of the House to this particular article against Judge Pickering, which does not contain an indictable offense under the laws of the United States. I suppose it would be difficult to frame a statute of the United States which would make the substance of this charge an indictable offense. The fourth article upon which Judge Pickering was tried and convicted is as follows:

"That whereas for the due, faithful, and impartial administration of justice, temperance and sobriety are essential qualities in the character of a judge, yet the said John Pickering, being a man of loose morals and intemperate habits, on the 11th and 12th days of November, in the year 1802, being then judge of the district court in and for the district of New Hampshire, did appear upon the bench of the said court for the purpose of administering justice in a state of total intoxication, produced by the free and intemperate use of inebriating liquors; and did then and there frequently, in a most profane and indecent manner, invoke the name of the Supreme Being, to the evil example of all the good citizens of the United States, and was then and there guilty of other high misdemeanors disgraceful to his own character as a judge, and degrading to the honor and dignity of the United States."

These were the ideas which our ancestors entertained of the character of a public officer. They felt that the dignity of the nation required that a judge should be clear in his high office. Upon that article, containing no one element of an indictable offense by any law of the United States then existing, he was found guilty and removed from his office.

Before passing from the case of Judge Pickering I desire to call attention to a view taken of his trial by the minority of the committee. Upon the question "guilty" or "not guilty" of the charges set out in the fourth article the yeas were 19 and the nays 7. It is stated substantially in the report of the minority (I do not profess to quote the exact words) that the finding was, in a certain sense, a political and partisan judgment. It may be true that the men who voted for the conviction of Judge Pickering were of one party; but I think the record shows that it was not by one party that he was removed from office. Five Senators, members of the court, refused to vote. If those five had voted in the negative Judge Pickering would have been acquitted. Why did those five gentlemen refuse to vote? The record shows. The son of Judge Pickering sent a memorial to the President of the Senate, setting forth that his father was then insane; that he was insane when he exhibited himself intoxicated upon the bench; that for two years previous to that time he had been insane; and that therefore he was not responsible for what he had done.

It is important for the House to see how these five men, who had it in their power to save Judge Pickering from conviction by the Senate, to save his reputation, acted on that occasion. Senators Armstrong, Bradley, Stone, Dayton, and White retired from the court, and the record shows that the two last, Dayton and White, did this, not because they believed Judge Pickering guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, (leaving it to be inferred that Armstrong, Bradley, and Stone did believe him guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors,) but because they did not choose to be compelled to give so solemn a vote upon a form of question which they considered unfair and calculated to preclude them from giving any distinct and explicit opinion upon the true and most important point in the case, namely, as to the insanity of Judge Pickering, and whether the charges contained in the articles of impeachment, if true, amounted in him—in him—to high crimes and misdemeanors; thereby upon the record admitting that if the question of insanity had not been raised there would have been no doubt as to the character of the offenses charged as high crimes and misdemeanors. Senator Dayton, one of the Senators who retired, said:

"They were simply to be allowed to vote whether Judge Pickering was guilty as charged—that is, guilty of the facts charged in each article—aye or no. If voted guilty of the facts, the sentence was to follow, without any previous question whether those facts amounted to a high crime or misdemeanor. The latent reason of this course was too obvious. There were members who were disposed to give sentence of removal against this unhappy judge upon the ground of the facts alleged and proved, who could not, however, conscientiously vote that they amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors, especially when committed by a man proved at the very time to be insane, and to have been so ever since, even to the present moment."

It therefore is clear, I think, from the action of the court in the case of Judge Pickering, that there was really no substantial difference of opinion upon the main question in which we are now concerned, which is, not whether Judge Pickering was insane, but whether the fourth article, one of the articles on which he was convicted, set forth impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors. Therefore, notwithstanding there may have been an irregularity, an informality, even an impropriety in the character of the question put to the court, it still remains true that upon the record a majority of more than two thirds of that court believed that the fourth article charged the respondent with impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors.

I come now to the last case—a very recent one—the case of Judge Humphreys, who in the year 1861 was removed from his office as judge of the district court of Tennessee. Judge Humphreys was convicted upon each of the seven articles which were presented before the Senate, with the exception of a portion of one of the specifications under one of the articles. The first article on which he was convicted (and we are compelled to assume that if it had been the only article he would have been convicted and removed from office) does not—and I speak with great confidence—set forth an indictable offense. Trespassing as I know I do upon the patience of the House, I still think that the view of the case I am presenting would be incomplete if I did not read that article in full to the House that I may have its judgment upon the question whether or not the offense set forth is indictable.

The first article was in these words:

"That, regardless of his duties as a citizen of the United States, and unmindful of the duties of his said office, and in violation of the sacred obligation of his official oath, 'to administer justice without respect to persons,' and faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent upon him as judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of the State of Tennessee, agreeable to the Constitution and laws of the United States,' the said West H. Humphreys, on the 29th day of December, A. D. 1860, in the city of Nashville, in said State, the said West H. Humphreys then being a citizen of the United States, and owing allegiance thereto, and then and there being judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of said State, at a public meeting on the day and year last aforesaid, held in said city of Nashville, and in the hearing of divers persons then there present, did endeavor by public speech to incite revolt and rebellion within said State against the Constitution and Government of the United States, and did then and there publicly declare that it was the right of the people of said State, by an ordinance of secession, to absolve themselves from all allegiance to the Government of the United States, the Constitution and laws thereof."

The offense with which Humphreys is charged in this article was committed on the 29th day of December, 1860, before the fall of Sumter, and when only one or two States had passed an ordinance of secession. The declaration was merely a declaration in a public speech that the State of Tennessee had the right to secede. That the article sets forth an impeachable offense I do not doubt; but no lawyer will maintain that Judge Humphreys could have been indicted for treason or for any other crime under the laws of the United States for what in this article is alleged as having been said by him, or for what he did say, or, in fine, for anything that he could have said in a public speech at Nashville at that time. Yet the House and the Senate of 1861 found that this article set forth "impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors" under the Constitution of the United States, and by a two-thirds majority of the Senate he was convicted and removed from office.

Mr. Speaker, my discussion of the law is ended. The view that I have attempted to maintain, however imperfectly presented, is strong in the principles of American jurisprudence. Those principles are derived from the English common law, and by the letter and spirit of the Constitution are transferred to and made a part of our system of public policy.

We stand firmly upon the authorities on this side of the Atlantic and on the other. We follow the practice of our ancestors, the men who framed the Constitution, and who may be presumed to have known their own intention, and to have been able to express that intention in appropriate words.

I turn now to the facts of the case. If the position I have taken is sound, that the meaning of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" is to be ascertained by reference to the principles of the English common law of crimes, Blackstone's definition, "that a crime or misdemeanor is an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it" becomes important. I stand upon this definition of the great writer upon English law as the connecting link between the theory of the law that I maintain and the facts which in this case are proved.

It is to be observed in connection with Blackstone's definition that in our system the Constitution and the statutes are the "public law" of which he speaks, and any act done by the President which is forbidden by the law or by the Constitution, or the omission by him to do what is by the law or the Constitution commanded, is a "high crime and misdemeanor," and renders him liable to impeachment and removal from office.

He is amenable to the House and the Senate in accordance with the great principles of public law of which the Constitution of the United States is the foundation. And it is true in a higher and better sense than it is true of the statutes that the President of the United States is bound to support the Constitution, the vital part of which, in reference to the public affairs of the country, is that he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and he violates that great provision of the Constitution especially when he himself disregards the law either by doing that which is forbidden or neglecting that which he is commanded to do.

Sir, in approaching the discussion of the transactions of which we complain I labor under great difficulties, such as are incident to the case. The President has in his hands the immense patronage of the Government. Its influence is all-pervading. The country was disappointed, no doubt, in the report of the committee, and very likely this House participated in the disappointment, that there was no specific, heinous, novel offense charged upon and proved against the President of the United States. It is in the very nature of the case that no such heinous offense could be proved. If we understand the teachings of the successive acts which are developed in the voluminous report of the testimony, and if we understand the facts which are there developed, they all point to one conclusion, and that is that the offense with which the President is charged, and of which I believe by history he will ultimately be convicted, is that he used as he had the opportunity, and misused as necessity and circumstances dictated, the great powers of the nation with which he was intrusted, for the purpose of reconstructing this Government in the interest of the rebellion, so that henceforth this Union, in its legitimate connection, in its relations, in its powers, in its historical character, should be merely the continuation of the Government which was organized at Montgomery and transferred to Richmond.

If, sir, this statement unfolds the nature of the case, there would not be found any particular specific act which would disclose the whole of the transaction. It was only by a series of acts, by a succession of events, by participation direct or indirect in numerous transactions, some of them open and some of them secret, that this great scheme was carried on and far on towards its final consummation. Hence it happens that when we present a particular charge it is one which for a long time has been before the public. The country has heard of it again and again. Men do not see in that particular offense any great enormity. Then we are told that this particular act was advised by this Cabinet officer, and that act assented to by another Cabinet officer. This matter was discussed in Cabinet meeting, the other was considered in a side chamber, and therefore the President is not alone responsible for anything that has been done. But, sir, I assert that whoever else may be responsible with him, he is responsible for himself. Any other theory is destructive to public liberty. We understand the relations which subsisted between the President and his Cabinet officers. The tenure-of-office act gave the latter a degree of independence. But whatever were the subsisting relations the President cannot shield himself by their counsel, and claim immunity for open, known, and willful violations of the laws of the land. I do not speak now of errors of judgment, but of open and avowed illegal acts personally done or authorized by himself. But he has not always had even the countenance of his Cabinet officers. The test-oath was suspended by the President against the opinion of Attorney General Speed. If Cabinet officers have been concerned in these illegal transactions I have for them, to a large extent, the same excuse that I have for myself, the same that I have for the members of this House and for the people of this country. In the beginning they did not understand the President's character, capacity, and purposes.

His capacity has not been comprehended by the country. Violent sometimes in language, indiscreet in manner, impulsive in action, unwise often in declamation, he is still animated by a persistency of purpose which never yields under any circumstances, but seeks by means covert and tortuous as well as open and direct the accomplishment of the purpose of his life.

I care not to go into an examination—indeed, I have neither the time nor the taste for it now—of the tortuous ways by which he has controlled men who in the public estimation are superior to himself. But my excuse for Cabinet officers, for members of Congress, for the country, is that in 1865, when he issued his proclamation for the reorganization of North Carolina, no one understood him. General Grant in his testimony says that he considered the plan temporary, to be approved or annulled when Congress should meet in December. But when Congress assembled the President told us that the work was ended; that the rebellious States were restored to the Union. He then planted himself firmly upon the proposition laid down in his North Carolina proclamation in defiance of the Constitution; in defiance of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that the power was in Congress to decide whether the government of a State was republican or not; in defiance of the cardinal principle of the sovereignty of the people through Congress. He ratified substantially in his message that which he had assumed merely in the proclamation of the 29th of May, that he was the United States for the purpose of deciding whether the government of a State was republican or not.

Sir, if this whole case rested merely upon that assumption, that exercise of power, I maintain that it would bring him specifically and exactly within the control of this House, for the purpose of arraigning him before the Senate upon the charge of seizing and usurping the greatest power of the legislative department of the Government, unless it be that of taxation, which he has also usurped and exercised in defiance of the Constitution. But even then the nature of the proceeding was not fully understood, and his motives were only partially disclosed. The public mind did not comprehend the character and extent of the usurpation.

Thus it was that his motive was concealed. He was not understood, and the charity of the country silenced suspicions of evil. But he moved on step by step. The country in the mean while was under the influence of his bold declarations, made frequently from the 14th of April to about the 1st of July, 1865; declarations which, even in the coldest of us, made the blood kindle in our veins, as he set forth the punishment to which the rebels were entitled. Even the most violent of the northern people, they who had suffered from the war, those who had offered their sons, their brothers, and their husbands in sacrifice for the Republic, shuddered when they listened to his declamation as to the power and duty of this Government to punish those who had been engaged in the rebellion. But from July, 1865, his conduct and his policy have been entirely opposed to the declarations made in the spring and early summer of that year. I see in those declarations only this: that they were designed and intended, when they were uttered, to conceal from the public the great purpose he had in view, which was to wrest this Government from the power of the loyal people of the North and turn it over to the tender mercies of those who had brought upon the country all the horrors of civil war.

I pass, sir, to the testimony of Judge Mathews, of Ohio, a person whom I never saw but once, and of whom I know nothing except what the record discloses. He was an officer of the northern Army, and he has been a judge of some of the courts in Cincinnati or vicinity. He says that in the month of February, 1865, when Mr. Johnson was passing from Tennessee to Washington to take the oath of office as Vice President, he called upon him at the Burnett House. The conversation was apparently unimportant, but it discloses a purpose on the part of Mr. Johnson. He said to Judge Mathews, "You and I were old Democrats." "Yes," replied Judge Mathews. Says Mr. Johnson, "I will tell you what it is: if the country is ever to be saved it is to be done through the old Democratic party." That was in February, 1865. He had then received the suffrages of a free and generous people. They had taken him from Tennessee, where he would have had no abiding place but for the armies of the Republic that protected him in his person and property. He was then entering upon the second office in the gift of the people, chosen by the great party of power and of progress in the country, which had saved the Union in its days of peril. No act had been by them done which could possibly have alienated him from them. Jefferson Davis was still at Richmond. The armies of Lee menaced the capital of his country. Andrew Johnson was approaching that capital for the purpose of taking the oath of office. That capital was merely a fortified garrison. He then declares that the country cannot be saved except by the old Democratic party.

What was the old Democratic party? It was the party of the South; it was made up of those men in the southern country who entered into the rebellion. That casual expression dropped at the Burnett House in Cincinnati in February, 1865, discloses his mysterious course from that day to this. I do not speak now of those Democrats of the North who stood by the flag of the country, who maintained the cause of the Union, but I speak of that old Democratic party of which he spoke, whose inspiring principle was devotion to slavery, hatred to republican institutions and the cause of the Union and of liberty. It was to them that Mr. Johnson, in February, 1865, turned his eyes for the salvation of the country. He was then Vice President only, but his career as President illustrates his devotion to the purpose he then entertained.

I come now to a brief statement of those acts of the President which disclose his motives and establish his guilt. First he and his friends sedulously promulgated the idea that what he did in the year 1865 was temporary.

Then came his message of December, 1865, which disclosed more fully his ulterior purpose.

Then came the speech of February 22, 1866, in which he arraigned the Congress of the United States collectively and individually, and, as I believe, made use of expressions which uttered by a sovereign of Great Britain in reference to Parliament and to individual members of Parliament would have led to most serious consequences, if not to the overthrow of the Government.

Then came his vetoes of the various reconstruction measures. I know very well that it will be said that the President has the veto power in his hands. To be sure he has; but it is a power to be exercised, like the discretion of a court, in good faith, for proper purposes, in honest judgment and good conscience, and not persistently in the execution of a scheme which is in contravention of the just authority of the legislative branch of the Government. It was exercised, however, by the President for the purpose of preventing reconstruction by congressional agency and by authority of law.

Then came his interference by his message of the 22d of June, 1866, and by other acts, all disclosing and furthering a purpose to prevent the ratification of the pending constitutional amendment, a matter with which, as the Executive of the country, he had no concern whatever. The Constitution provides that the House and the Senate, by specified means, may propose amendments to the Constitution; and if any subject is wholly separated from executive authority or control it is this power to amend the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution reserves this power to Congress and to the people, excluding the President. In the same year he suspended the test-oath, against the advice of the Attorney General, and appointed men to office who, as he well knew, could not take that oath. The oath was prescribed for the purpose of protecting the country against the presence of disloyal persons in office—a measure necessary to the public safety. Can any act be more reprehensible? Can any act be more criminal? Can any act be more clearly within Blackstone's definition of "crimes and misdemeanors?"

Then follows his surrender of abandoned lands. In 1865 we passed the first Freedmen's Bureau bill, in which we set apart the abandoned lands for the negroes and refugees of the South. In violation of law and without authority of law he has restored them to their former rebel owners. This class of property was of the value of many millions of money.

We had captured in the South vast amounts of railway property. All these millions of property he has turned over to their former rebel proprietors. In many instances, as in the case of one railway, the Government itself, under his special direction and control, in the State of Tennessee constructed fifty-four miles of railway at an expense of more than two million dollars. This railway, with others, was turned over without consideration, without power to make reclamation or to obtain compensation, and all without authority of law.

We possessed a vast amount of rolling stock used on southern roads during the war, some of it captured from the enemy. The rolling stock captured he restored without money and without price. Other portions of it, constructed by the Government of the United States, or purchased of manufacturers or of railroad companies, he sold without authority of law to corporations that, according to the principles of law, were insolvent. When the time arrived for payment to the Government many of them neglected to comply with the conditions of sale. One of those corporations, the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad, Tennessee, made an exhibit by which it appeared they had money on hand to pay the Government what they owed it. The officers of the Government demanded payment, and threatened to take possession of the road in case of further neglect. President Johnson, by his simple order, and that, as far as is known, without consultation with any member of the Cabinet, authorized, or rather directed, a delay or postponement in the collection of this debt. Agreeably to a previous order which he had issued, the interest on the bonds guaranteed by the State of Tennessee to this road, which had been due three or four years, were then paid out of money which upon every principle of reason, equity, and law belonged to the Government. The money had been earned by the use of the rolling stock which the Government had furnished.

Mr. Johnson's order was in utter disregard of the great principle that of all creditors the Government is to be first paid. Under no circumstances does the law concede to the citizen the right of payment until the claim of the sovereign is satisfied.

One important fact in connection with this transaction is that the President himself was the holder of these Tennessee State bonds, issued for the benefit of this road, to the amount of either nineteen thousand or thirty thousand dollars; and that of that money, which upon the contract and by every principle of law was due to the United States, he received past interest for about four years. A small matter, you may say; a small matter the country may say; but in a public trust he had no right, in the first place, to make sale of this property; secondly, he had no right to postpone payment, and above all he had no right to delay payment for the purpose of receiving to himself that which belonged to the Government. Nor is it any excuse for him that there were other holders, whether loyal or rebel, who shared the benefits of this transaction.

Then there is connected with these proceedings other public acts, such as the appointment of provisional governors for North Carolina and the other nine States without any authority of law. Not only that, but he authorized the payment of salaries without authority of law. Not only that, he ordered payment from the War Department of those salaries, notwithstanding there had been no appropriation by law, and notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States says that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of an appropriation by law.

When you bring all these acts together; when you consider what he has said; when you consider what he has done; when you consider that he has appropriated the public property for the benefit of rebels; when you consider that in every public act, as far as we can learn, from May, 1865, to the present time, all has tended to this great result, the restoration of the rebels to power under and in the Government of the country; when you consider all these things, can there be any doubt as to his purpose, or doubt as to the criminality of his purpose and his responsibility under the Constitution?

It may not be possible, by specific charge, to arraign him for this great crime, but is he therefore to escape? These offenses which I have enumerated, which are impeachable—and I have enumerated but a part of them—are the acts, the individual acts, the subordinate crimes, the tributary offenses to the accomplishment of the great object which he had in view. But if, upon the body of the testimony, you are satisfied of his purpose, and if you are satisfied that these tributary offenses were committed as the means of enabling him to accomplish this great crime, will you hesitate to try him and convict him upon those charges of which he is manifestly guilty, even if they appear to be of inferior importance, knowing that they were in themselves misdemeanors, that they were tributary offenses, and that in this way, and in this way only, can you protect the State against the final consummation of his crime? We have not yet seen the end of this contest.

I am not disposed to enter into the region of prophecy, but we can understand the logic of propositions. The propositions which the President has laid down in his last message and elsewhere will lead to certain difficulty if they are acted upon. Whether they will be acted upon I cannot say. The first proposition is, that under some circumstances an act of Congress may be in his judgment so unconstitutional that he will violate the law and utterly disregard legislative authority. This is an assumption of power which strikes at the foundation of the Government. The Constitution authorizes Congress to pass bills. When they have been passed they are presented to the President for his approval or objection. If he objects to a bill, for constitutional or other reason, he returns it to the House in which it originated; and then and there his power over the subject is exhausted. If the House and Senate by a two-thirds vote pass a bill it becomes a law, and until it is repealed by the same authority or annulled by the Supreme Court the President has but one duty, and that is to obey it; and no consideration or opinion of his as to its constitutionality will defend or protect him in any degree. The opposite doctrine is fraught with evils of the most alarming character to the country. If the President may refuse to execute or may violate a law because he thinks it unconstitutional in a certain particular, another President may disregard it for another reason; and thus the Government becomes not a Government of laws, but a Government of men. Every civil officer has the same right in this respect as the President. If the latter has the right to disregard a law because he thinks it unconstitutional the Secretary of the Treasury and every subordinate has the same right. Is that doctrine to prevail in this country?

But coupled with that declaration is another declaration, that the negroes of the South have no right whatever to vote. Our whole plan of reconstruction is based upon the doctrine that the loyal people of the South, black and white, are to vote. Now, while there is no evidence conclusively establishing the fact, it is still undoubtedly true that thousands and tens of thousands of white men in the States recently in rebellion have abstained from participation in the work of calling the conventions because they have been stimulated by the conduct of the President to believe that they will ultimately be able to secure governments from which the negro population will be excluded. What is our condition to-day? Governments are being set up in the ten States largely by the black people, and without the concurrence of the whites, that concurrence being refused, to a large extent, through the influence of the President. Are we to leave this officer, if we judge him to be guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, in control of the Army and the Navy, with his declaration upon the record that under certain circumstances he will not execute the laws? He has the control of the Army. Do you not suppose that next November a single soldier at each polling place in the southern country, aided by the whites, could prevent the entire negro population from voting? And if it is for the interest of the President to do so have we any reason to anticipate a different course of conduct? At any rate, such is the logic of the propositions which he has presented to us. If that logic be followed, the next presidential election will be heralded by civil war, or the next inauguration of a President of the United States will be the occasion for the renewal of fratricidal strife.

Mr. Speaker, we are at present involved in financial difficulties. I see no way of escape while Mr. Johnson is President of the United States. I assent to much of what he has said in his message concerning the effects of the tenure-of-office act. From my experience in the internal revenue office I reach the conclusion that it is substantially impossible to collect the taxes while the tenure-of-office act is in force; and I have no doubt that whenever a new Administration is organized, of whatever party it may be, some of the essential provisions of that act will be changed. The reason, Mr. Speaker, of the present difficulty is due to the fact that the persons engaged in plundering the revenues of the country are more or less associated criminally with public officers. The character of those public officers can be substantially known in the internal revenue office and in the Treasury Department; but if the Secretary of the Treasury and the President before they can remove officers against whom probable cause exists are obliged to wait until they have evidence which will satisfy the Senate of their guilt the very process of waiting for that evidence to be procured exhausts the public revenues. There is but one way of overcoming this difficulty. When the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are in harmony, and the Commissioner is satisfied from the circumstances existing that an officer is in collusion with thieves, he can ask the President for the removal of that man; and then there should exist the power of removal by a stroke of the pen. Neither the official nor his friends should know the reason therefor. Nothing so inspires officials with zeal in the discharge of their duties as to feel that if they are derelict their commissions may at any moment be taken from them.

But what is our position to-day? Can this House and the Senate, with the knowledge that they have of the President's purposes and of the character of the men who surround him, give him the necessary power? Do they not feel that if he be allowed such power these places will be given to worse men? Hence I say that with Mr. Johnson in office from this time until the 4th of March, 1869, there is no remedy for these grievances. These are considerations only why we should not hesitate to do that which justice authorizes us to do if we believe that the President has been guilty of impeachable offenses.

Mr. Speaker, all rests here. To this House is given under the Constitution the sole power of impeachment; and this power of impeachment furnishes the only means by which we can secure the execution of the laws. And those of our fellow-citizens who desire the administration of the law ought to sustain this House while it executes that great law which is in its hands and which is nowhere else, while it performs a high and solemn duty resting upon it by which that man who has been the chief violator of law shall be removed, and without which there can be no execution of the law anywhere. Therefore the whole responsibility, whatever it may be, for the non-execution of the laws of the country is, in the presence of these great facts, upon this House. If this House believes that the President has executed the laws of the country, that he has obeyed the provision of the Constitution to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, then it is our duty to sustain him, to lift up his hands, to strengthen his arms; but if we believe, as upon this record I think we cannot do otherwise than believe, that he has disregarded that great injunction of the Constitution to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, there is but one remedy. The remedy is with this House, and it is nowhere else. If we neglect or refuse to use our powers when the case arises demanding decisive action the Government ceases to be a Government of laws and becomes a Government of men.

But, sir, in conclusion, I am prepared to accept the judgment of this House as a patriotic judgment. I shall then wait for the teaching of events. I do not despair of a great people. They can endure trials. They can overcome obstacles. If we err, they, even through the suffering so caused, will assert finally the authority of justice and the majesty of law. Let nothing be done under the influence of passion, prejudice, or political excitement. But the vindication of the laws is a duty, and it often falls to the lot of a political party to perform it. My own convictions are clear. I see my country just emerging from civil war, distracted, torn, and bleeding; her people heavily taxed and the public revenues plundered; her currency depreciated; her credit impaired, so that in the markets of Europe she is associated with Austria, Turkey, and Spain. Millions of her people, but recently in rebellion, still bold, defiant, aggressive; and millions more loyal, dutiful, and hopeful, too, even when peril menaces, after two years of struggle, still without security, and all this, as I believe, in consequence of the doings and designs of the President of the United States. Can I hesitate; can I yield my judgment to circumstances which in the nature of the case must be temporary? I will not ask this House to do its duty; that would not be decorous in me. It will do its duty, and its duty will have been equally performed whether the results harmonize with my judgment or not.

But, sir, I may look beyond the present moment and assume that to be done which upon my judgment and conscience I think ought to be done.

Consider how all the affairs of the country would be changed and improved. Civil government would be restored speedily to ten States; the civil rights of all the people would be recognized and made secure; the loyal men would exercise the great privilege of self-government, safe in their own power and in the benign protection of the national Government; those recently in rebellion would soon be restored to all their political privileges; industry would be honored and well recompensed; production, consumption, and trade immensely developed; the revenues of the country collected; public plunder no longer fostered as an art; taxes diminished; the public credit so improved that the questions depending upon the value of our currency would be settled without disturbance or violent legislation; the Army reduced; and the power of the nation so augmented and everywhere respected as that a single ship-of-war would protect the commerce of the Mediterranean or of the Gulf of Mexico.

These things are not and cannot now be, because the President is not "clear in his high office," disregarding, as he does, the injunction of the Constitution upon him to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

So mighty is the machinery of the Government that the weight of the President's hand upon the central lever affects the fortune of every citizen. With $150,000,000 in the Treasury, and unlimited power to accumulate and to disburse, a nod of his head makes his friends prosper while his enemies perish. In the presence of this power, and surrounded as we are with evidence of the evil results of a policy which we have so long tolerated but never approved, are we to hesitate, to delay, to abandon the field in the hope that by other means and by other agencies the final redemption of the nation is to be secured?

Believing that Andrew Johnson is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors I have assented to, and by the direction of a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary reported, a resolution for his impeachment. This resolution, upon my conscience and best judgment, I now support.

In contemplation of the law, and upon the facts, I believe him to be so guilty. And thereon I ask the judgment of the House.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES F. WILSON, OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 6, 1867.

The House having under consideration the following resolution, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] presents a much stronger case than will be found in the record which he reported to this body. I presume it is fair for me to conclude that the judgment of the House will be based upon the record. That this shall be the case is all that I desire to ask of the House. I will as briefly as possible notice some of the points which have been made by the gentleman, and submit the case to the judgment of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I am astonished at the line of argument pursued by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I have great respect for his ability, and therefore must say that I am disappointed by the argument he has just closed. He has consumed about one half of his time in making a determined and persistent attack upon one feature of the report of the minority, which, so far as this proceeding is concerned, might be stricken from the record without affecting the case in the remotest degree. No member of the minority of the committee regards the doctrine that only crimes and misdemeanors indictable under the statutes of the United States will justify an impeachment of a civil officer of the United States of the slightest importance so far as a correct determination of this case is concerned. We believe the doctrine to be correct, but regarded it of so little consequence in its effect on this case that it is introduced into our report as a suggestion rather than as an affirmative declaration of the law. It may be important in future cases, and is therefore placed on the records of the House, not in expectation that any determination of the present proceeding will either approve or disapprove of it. It is immaterial what opinions members may have of it. I will let it rest upon the argument contained in the minority report, and wait for some person to answer it when a case arises in which it may be material. The speech to which we have listened most determinedly asserted that this question has been settled against the view taken of it by the minority—settled by the law and practice in this country. The gentleman seems to have forgotten that in the report presented by him to the House in this case he said:

"The cases here, though all of offenses that were not statutory crimes or misdemeanors, have been so few as to leave this question open, to be decided hereafter upon those great reasons of State that lie at the foundation of the law of Parliament, which is the rule that must govern ultimately here."—Page 51.

This admission is of some value as it leaves to the gentleman the task of harmonizing his speech with the report which he presented to this House. The report says it is an open question, the speech says it is settled. This conflict of statement is not mine. I leave its settlement to its author.

The gentleman also told us that English precedents ought not to influence the action of this House in the exercise of its power of impeachment. Why, then, did he resort to those precedents in support of his report, and for the purpose of giving force to his speech? The report and the speech cite English text writers. Why is this if English cases have nothing to do with guiding the conscience of this House? The assertion of the gentleman is disputed both by the report and by the speech. He answers himself, and I am content to leave him in that position.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Impeachment—Mr. Wilson.

HO. OF REPS.

But he tells us that the power of impeachment is not delegated to the two Houses for the punishment of criminals; that no crime is necessarily involved in an exercise of this power; that it looks merely to a removal of an officer who may have conducted himself in a manner which the conscience of the House disapproves; that a trial on impeachment is not a trial for crime in its technical sense. I commend to him as an answer to his most singular suggestion that part of section two of article three of the Constitution which says:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury," &c.

Can a non-indictable offense be tried by a jury? The gentleman from Massachusetts will not so affirm. Then, are not trials in cases of impeachments trials for indictable crimes, at least at common law? How will the gentleman avoid this conclusion except by rejecting the Constitution and affirming as its superior the conscience of this House, which may be Republican now and Democratic at no distant day? The Constitution is more stable than the conscience of this House; and it may be well for us to consider the promise of stability which these two regulators of power present. I prefer the Constitution to that conscience of this body which may be evidenced by a mere partisan majority. I would be willing to be judged by a Republican conscience and yet shrink from the conclusions of one directed by a Democratic majority. I prefer that both shall be subject to the limitations of the Constitution. This will secure the rights of all parties and all persons.

The gentleman says, again, that impeachments look not to the punishment of persons, but to the removal of officers. Let this be granted for the sake of the present argument. What follows? The Constitution answers that for whatever purpose an impeachment may be instituted it must be based on "treason, bribery, or other high crime or misdemeanor." Now, sir, if this proceeding is not for punishment, if it is for something else, still it is plain we cannot put its machinery in motion unless we have the force of a crime or misdemeanor to move it.

And here we are told that for the meaning of the terms "high crimes and misdemeanors" we must resort to the common law of Parliament. If this be true what comes of the declaration that "English precedents should not influence the action of this House in its exercise of the power of impeachment?" Let the gentleman from Massachusetts answer this question, for it springs from his speech. Authority upon authority based on parliamentary law is presented by the report which he made to this House in this case, and yet we are told that English cases should not influence our action. Why, then, did the report of the majority force them upon our attention? Let the gentleman answer, for his report compels the presence of this question.

Sir, I am willing to go with the gentleman to the common law of Parliament to ascertain what the terms "high crimes and misdemeanors" mean. He denied the authority of this source of information and at the same time invited us to it as constituting an umpire in the matter of our dispute. Let him take the consequences of this appeal. I accept his umpire, and claim that he shall stand by the decision. I have presented in the report of the minority two well-considered and thoroughly-digested cases made up by this umpire. Both of these affirm that the terms "high crimes and misdemeanors" mean offenses indictable by the common law of England or the statutes of Parliament.

I refer to the cases of Macclesfield and Melville—two of the best-considered of all the English cases. They both affirm this doctrine. Macclesfield was convicted upon the express ground that his offense was indictable under the act of Edward VI; Melville, on the contrary, was acquitted upon the ground that the case did not show, as committed by him, an offense which would support a presentment or indictment in any court of the realm.

These cases follow the current authority of England, and I ask the gentleman to cite a single case in opposition thereto entitled to the respect of this House. Let him do it now if he can. I will pause for a reply if he has one to make. Give to this House, if you can, a single case which departs from the rule which I have affirmed. I demand the case, and will not be put off with the opinions of elementary writers. Tell this body wherein the House of Lords has crossed the path of the report of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary made in this case, so far as it concerns the English authorities. I care nothing for the assertions which have been made relative to this case, but demand the authorities which will support them. Not one case has been cited against the position which I have assumed, and I declare that not one of respectability can be found in opposition thereto.

The gentleman asserted with an air of triumph that the crime of murder might be committed by the President or any other civil officer of the United States in places and under circumstances which would not bring the crime within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and demanded to know whether in such a case an objection would be interposed to an impeachment of the offending officer.

I answer this question by quoting the language of the gentleman's own report, as follows:

"The legitimate causes of impeachment can only have reference to public character and official duty. In general, those offenses which may be committed equally by a private person as a public officer are not the subjects of impeachment. Murder, burglary, robbery, and, indeed, all offenses not immediately connected with office, except the two expressly mentioned, are left to the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, and neither House can regularly inquire into them except for the purpose of expelling the member."

This answers the gentleman's inquiry. The source from whence the answer comes may render its presence in some degree uncomfortable to the honorable gentleman, but in no wise detracts from its aptness and force. It very plainly declares that the supposititious case stated by the gentleman would not sustain an impeachment of a civil officer, and this is sufficient for my present purpose. It might be difficult for the conscience of this House to determine which rule of conduct to follow in such a case—the one presented by the majority report or the one stated in the speech to which we have listened.

The gentleman has told us that the framers of our Constitution designed to strip the impeaching power of some of its severest features—that while the House of Lords of England, upon presentment by the Commons, may try any subject of the Crown, entertain jurisdiction of every grade of offense known to the law of the realm, and apply the full measure of punishment, we have been confined in our inquiries to civil officers, and the Senate, in pronouncing judgment, to removal from and disqualification to hold office. I grant this, and claim that the limitation imposed by the Constitution shall be observed. But the gentleman seeks to avoid the force of this limitation by enlarging the field of inquiry, and changing the character of the power. He told us that the power of impeachment vested in this House is subject to no revision or control, and that its exercise is to be guided solely by the conscience of the House. Correctly interpreted, this doctrine, as it seems to me, comes to this: that whatever this House may declare on its conscience to be an impeachable offense, reduce to the form of articles, and carry to the Senate for trial, that body is only to be allowed to declare whether the officer impeached is guilty of the facts presented against him, but is not to be permitted to say that such facts do or do not constitute a crime or misdemeanor. For, if this conscience is not subject to any control or revision, having determined that a given state of facts constitute a high crime or misdemeanor, it would seem to follow, logically, that the House must demand judgment of conviction on proof of the facts charged, regardless of the opinions of the members of the Senate respecting the presence or absence of those elements which alone can constitute any act a real crime.

Sir, let us consider that, while this House is now guided by a Republican conscience, it may at some time in the future be directed by a Democratic conscience. Does he desire us to intrust the character, extent, and uses of this power to the shifting fortunes of political parties? What could be more dangerous to the peace and safety of the Government than this? This doctrine may carry this case to the determination desired by the gentleman. But can he not see that it may return to plague him and the country? He admitted that if the minority of the committee are right on the law the majority have no case whatever. And I may here say that if he is right in his views of the power of impeachment no law is needed, for the law might control the conscience of the House.

I agree with him in the statement that Congress cannot declare and punish as a crime an act which does not involve the elements of crime as they are known to and established by the common law. But this doctrine is fatal to his argument and destructive of his case; for if it be true the conscience of this House is as much bound by it when exercising the impeaching power as it is in matters of ordinary legislation. You cannot bind the ordinary legislative power of this House by the principle here laid down and then, when you come to exercise the impeaching power, brush it out of the way in order that the obnoxious officer may be removed without the presentation of some act involving the well-known elements of crime.

The position which the minority of the committee occupy in this case may be summed up in these words: that no civil officer of the United States can be lawfully impeached except for a crime or misdemeanor known to the law; that this body must be guided by the law, and not by that indefinite something called its conscience, which may be one thing to-day and quite a different one to-morrow. If the case now before us, tested by the principles of criminal law, discloses high crimes or misdemeanors coming within the rule I have stated, then the gentleman is right in demanding that the President of the United States be impeached; and I here throw open to the gentleman the range of both statutory and common law impeachable crimes. If these cannot be found in the record of this case, then no amount of conscience in House and Senate can justify us in proceeding further with it.

The gentleman quoted from Woodeson to show that non-indictable offenses may justify an impeachment of a civil officer, but he did not read far enough. The principles of which Woodeson is treating in the lecture from which the passage read by the gentleman is taken involve more than the power of impeachment: they involve the power of attainder and the power to pass bills of pains and penalties. These powers have been confused and confounded by many of the elementary writers. Woodeson has been more fortunate than most writers in presenting the lines which divide these powers. His lecture on the subject of parliamentary impeachments concludes as follows:

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Wilson.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

"Impeachments, as we have seen, are founded and proved upon the laws in being. A more extraordinary course is sometimes adopted. New and occasional laws have been passed for the punishment of particular offenders. Such ordinances are called bills of attainder, and bills of pains and penalties."

And he opens the next succeeding lecture, in which he treats specially of bills of attainder and bills of pains and penalties, with this language:

"All the modes of criminal prosecutions hitherto spoken of, whether by impeachment or otherwise, are vindications of the laws in being, on which they are founded. But, besides the regular enforcement of established law, the annals of most countries record single exertions of penal justice adapted to exigencies unprovided for in the criminal code. Such acts of supreme power are with unscaled bills of attainder, which are capital sentences, and bills of pains and penalties, which inflict a milder degree of punishment."

That is what Woodeson said, and it presents distinctly the lines which divide these several parliamentary powers. Impeachments were for offenses known to the law; were founded on the laws in being; for other offenses the sharp and unlimited powers of attainder and bills of pains and penalties were used. These extraordinary powers are denied to us by the Constitution. We may provide for crimes and misdemeanors known to the law when the acts constituting them were done. "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

The gentleman also referred to Story. But how loosely Judge Story wrote on this subject may be seen by reading a few lines from one of the sections of his Commentaries:

"The object of these prosecutions in America, as well as in England, is to reach high and potent offenders, such as might be presumed to escape punishment in the ordinary tribunals, either from their own extraordinary influence or from the imperfect organization and power of these tribunals."—Story's Commentaries, section 688.

Does this present a correct idea of the power of impeachment vested in this House by the Constitution? Sir, send out your committee upon charges preferred against some petty postmaster who has not influence enough in his neighborhood to change the result of an election for a justice of the peace, and he, within the contemplation of the Constitution, is one of these "high and potent offenders" who must be punished by an exercise of this grand power lodged in the House of Representatives, for he is a civil officer of the United States. Why, sir, it is simply ridiculous, and it only tends to show how loosely the text writers have written on this subject.

But the gentleman found in Story an authority to the effect that we may impeach for "political offenses." What is a "political offense?" That is a broad and a very significant term in this country. What is a "political offense?" Is it the doing of something that the dominant political party in the country do not like? That, in one sense, is a political offense. Are we to impeach for that? We did not like the removal of our own friends from office by the present President. Are we to impeach for that? He has done many acts of political littleness, meanness, and treachery. Are these impeachable political offenses? Sir, it is unsafe for us to wander into the field of political or party action for offenses upon which to rest the impeaching power of this House. Disaster alone could result from such a course of procedure.

The gentleman referred to cases which have occurred in this country. We have had, as he stated, the case of Blount, of Pickering, of Chase, of Peck, of Humphrey. Blount's case was decided, as the gentleman informed us, upon a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. Certainly, then, that case established no precedent beyond that involved in the one point passed upon by the court. In Chase's case the gentleman says he finds an approval of the doctrine he has argued here to-day, that something less than an indictable offense may be the subject of an impeachment. How is that ascertained? I have always supposed that before the action of a court can be treated as authority it must decide something in such a manner as to disclose the principle underlying its action and guiding its conduct. Chase was tried. What was the result? He was acquitted. Why? The record does not disclose the reason; but it must have been because the court did not believe him guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. The proof of the facts charged was very strong, and an acquittal certainly does not tend to establish the doctrine that an impeachment may be properly had for a non-indictable offense. In what did the case originate? In the partisan feelings and excitements of the times. And this case has gone into your history as a partisan impeachment.

Then we come to the Pickering case. As the minority have said in their report, that case is a disgrace to the court that tried it. It is very manifest from the report of the case that it also was a partisan case. Notwithstanding the court permitted his counsel to set up the plea of insanity, the case was disposed of without regard to that plea, although, if anything was proved in the case, it was that Pickering was insane. And if it is authority for any purpose or thing, it is that an insane man may be held criminally liable, and be punished for acts done by him in the midst of his insanity and caused thereby. Such a doctrine is monstrous. The Constitution has provided another remedy for such cases.

The Humphrey case, it is said, was not based, so far as the first article was concerned, on any act for which he could have been indicted. What are the facts? The South Carolina convention passed the ordinance of secession on the 17th day of December, 1860. The criminal act laid to the charge of Humphrey, and on which the first article rested, was alleged to have transpired on the 29th day of the same month, at which time he, being a judge of the district court of the United States, urged in a public speech the people of Tennessee to secede and make common cause with the people of South Carolina in the war which they had levied against the United States. This was an act of treason. War having been levied, his conduct made him a traitor.

I will not occupy the attention of the House longer on the law of this case, for I want to have done with it. Briefly I will refer to some of the facts to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has directed our attention, for, after all, upon these must depend mainly the termination of this case. The first things to which the gentleman refers are the acts of the President having reference to the reconstruction of the rebel States.

He excuses to some extent some of the advisers of the President on the ground that they, at the inauguration of the executive plan of reconstruction, did not understand his motives nor comprehend his wicked designs. How did the plan originate and by whom was it prepared? The North Carolina proclamation, which was followed in every other case, seems mainly to have been the work of Mr. Stanton, and I am sure we will not question his patriotism. The President certainly did not use him as an instrument to carry out his wicked designs. He could not use him for any such purpose. But it is said that the President's real motive was to turn over the power of the Government to the possession of the rebels who had made war upon it, and that this was not discovered until his first annual message was communicated to Congress in December, 1865, when the motive was disclosed and the plot became apparent. Soon after this message had been delivered to Congress the contest between the executive and legislative departments of the Government commenced. Presidential vetoes came in upon us. The Freedmen's Bureau bill and the civil rights bill fell under his hand. The notorious presidential speech of the 22d of February, 1866, proclaimed the breach between us and the President irreparable. The official heads of our friends fell into the Executive basket with astonishing rapidity. We were outraged by this conduct of the man who had been elevated to power by our votes. We appealed to a deceived people, and they sustained us, as, I doubt not, they will continue to do.

More than six months after the date when the gentleman from Massachusetts says he discovered the real motive and criminal design of the President in this matter of reconstruction the report of the joint committee which had been charged with that subject was made to the two Houses of Congress. This report was made on the 18th day of June, 1866, and in it our agents told us of the wretched results of the President's policy. They had carefully surveyed the entire field, but gave us no notice of the motive and design of the President, which my friend from Massachusetts has just told us he had discovered in December, 1865. On the contrary, they said in that report:

"While your committee do not for a moment impute to the President any such design," [to destroy the constitutional form of Government, and absorb its powers in the Executive], "but cheerfully concede to him the most patriotic motives, they cannot but look with alarm upon a precedent so fraught with danger to the Republic."

And to that report the name of my friend from Massachusetts is signed. This was months after the December discovery, and in the midst of the bitter political contest which resulted from the President's unjustifiable desertion of the party which had trusted him and elevated him to the second office in the Government.

Sir, I am not here to defend the President. He must be a bold man who will undertake that task. I have not boldness sufficient for it, even if I had the inclination, which in the remotest degree does not exist in my mind; for I believe him to be the worst of the Presidents. But it does seem strange to me that any member of that able, thorough, pertinacious Committee on Reconstruction should now demand an impeachment of the President for doing the acts which they reported to us he had done from patriotic motives. Such motives, if they did exist, will not support an allegation of criminal intent.

It is affirmed that the testimony of Stanley Mathews discloses that the President, from the very date of his first association with the Republican party, designed treachery. The testimony of this witness and that of Hon. Jeremiah S. Black show that the President never was in earnest accord with the Republican party. This will account for much of his strange and reprehensible conduct. But it does not establish a crime. It discloses a trait of character bad almost beyond precedent, and shows how cautious political parties should be in selecting candidates for official positions. We committed a terrible blunder, not to say a political crime, when we selected Andrew Johnson as our candidate for the Vice Presidential office. We trusted too much to his oft-repeated utterances of devotion to the progressive principles of the Republican organization, and unfortunately forgot, for the time being, his antecedents as a public man, and the influences and associations which had molded his character, and would be likely to direct his action as a public officer. His offenses in this regard, sad and grave as they are, must be tried by the suffrages of the people, and not on impeachment before the Senate.

The next grand charge which is advanced in support of the demand for an impeachment of the President is the surrender of property of which the Government and its agents held possession. In this charge the surrender of railroads in the insurgent States occupies a conspicuous position. But the policy which led to this did not originate with the President. Secretary Stanton's testimony shows that with himself and the Quartermaster General this policy originated. He regarded his action in the premises as in consonance with the requirements of a great public policy, which demanded the opening of these great channels of commerce to the trade and business of the country, as tending to a renewal of prosperity and as an effective means of reconstruction.

Mr. DAWES. And stands by it now.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir—so far as I have any information—adheres to it yet.

Whatever may be the rule of public law with reference to property seized in time of war, and which may have been occupied or used by the public enemy, this Government established its own rule, as it had a right to do, by enacting the confiscation act of 1862. None of the railroads surrendered had been seized, condemned, and sold under the provisions of that act, nor had the stock which represented the title of the stockholders to the property been confiscated in pursuance of its provisions. The Government had not acquired title to this property by either of these modes. The Government held possession of the roads for military purposes, and when the war closed surrendered that possession to the corporations owning them, which action was in accord with the opinions of Attorneys General Speed and Staunbury that the property of corporations did not come within the confiscation act of 1862; and that if it did, said act, being a war measure, could not properly be enforced after the rebellion had been suppressed and the war had ceased. It does not occur to me that this branch of the case affords evidence of criminal conduct.

The surrender of property to individuals is covered to a great extent by this view of the President's legal advisers, and in a larger degree by the well-established principle that a full pardon restores to the recipient all of his rights which have not become vested in third parties. The construction given to the confiscation act of 1862 and the effect of a full pardon may be said to cover all of these cases of surrender of property. If the pardons, whether by special act of grace or by general amnesty, were in any case corruptly granted, the record submitted to this House by the committee does not disclose the fact.

The sale of movable property to railway corporations is complained of. In all cases where this character came within the rule already stated respecting the property of corporations, all sums realized by such sale were gains to the Government. In other cases, as when the Government owned the same by virtue of purchase or manufacture, the sales were not authorized by law, but it does not appear that they were made from corrupt or criminal motives or for the purpose of private gain.

The first plan adopted for the regulation of these sales seems to have been the work of the Quartermaster General, approved by the Secretary of War. This was subsequently changed by the President, and the sales proceeded. How has the President been profited by this? The sales inured to the benefit of the Government. The President derived no benefit therefrom.

But it is alleged that he did derive a benefit by extending the time for the payment of the amount due to the Government from the Nashville and Chattanooga Railway Company; that he held bonds of this company, and by extending the time in which the company had agreed to pay the same he secured the payment of the interest due on his own bonds. The interest on these bonds was guaranteed by the State of Tennessee, and the utmost amount he could save thereby would be the interest on the amount of interest due which might accrue between the date of the extension or final payment. This would be at most an inconsiderable sum. Still this action of the President might afford some color to the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts if it stood alone amid the demands of southern railway companies for extensions of time in which payments were to be made by them to the Government. But it does not stand alone—it is not an exceptional case. The first extensions were granted by order of Major General Thomas, others by order of the Secretary of War, (Mr. Stanton,) until nearly if not quite all of the southern companies became the recipients of the benefits of a system which seems to have become general. If these acts of the Secretary of War and of General Thomas were illegal and criminal, (which I presume no one will claim they were,) the President cannot be charged criminally with them unless it appear that they were done by his subordinates with his consent, or at least with his knowledge, and it will hardly be claimed that this is established by the testimony in this case.

Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House much longer by commenting on this case. If I were to refer to all of the facts of the case, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I could accomplish no more than has already been achieved by the minority report, and I am content to leave it with the House upon the argument and review presented by that document. It would be an unprofitable consumption of time for me to go beyond it. A few minutes more and I will have done.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has expressed his fears that a failure to impeach and remove the President from office will result in a total defeat of the congressional plan of reconstruction. How can this be? The constitutional life of this Congress will measure the full limit of the President's official term. We most assuredly will not surrender our plan. No power can turn us from this determination. Before the expiration of this Congress we hope to have every State restored on the just and equitable principles of our plan. If this result be not realized, to our successors will be left the task of completing our labors, unless the people in the next congressional elections determine to reverse our resolve by returning a majority to this House hostile to the system of reconstruction which we have adopted. I am willing to trust the people in this regard without fear as to the judgment they will pronounce. A failure of our plan of reconstruction can be secured only by the voice of the people at the ballot-box. I cannot believe that it will thus fail, but if it should it will be the act of the people and not of the President. We may not impeach for this.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has remarked that the President may interfere with the next presidential election in the southern States; that he may station soldiers at the voting places and overawe the loyal vote of those States, especially the colored vote; and we must, I suppose, guard against the possibility of this by his impeachment and removal from office. This position, if I state it correctly, is startling. Are we to impeach the President for what he may do in the future? Do our fears constitute in the President high crimes and misdemeanors? Are we to wander beyond the record of this case and found our judgment of it on the possibilities of the future? This would lead us even beyond the conscience of this House.

Sir, we must be guided by some rule in this grave proceeding—something more certain than an impossibility to arraign the President for a specific crime. And when the gentleman from Massachusetts, in commenting on one of the alleged offenses of the President, stated that we could not "arraign him for the specific crime," he disclosed the weakness of the case we are now considering. If we cannot arraign the President for a specific crime for what are we to proceed against him? For a bundle of generalities such as we have in the volume of testimony reported by the committee to the House in this case? If we cannot state upon paper a specific crime how are we to carry this case to the Senate for trial?

Mr. Speaker, I have done. Appreciating the imperfections of my reply to the lengthy argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I am nevertheless willing to submit this case to the deliberate judgment of this House. I believe the country desires a speedy disposition of it. If we are to impeach the President it should be done without further delay. If we are to arrive at a different conclusion the sooner we reach it the better it will be for all of the interests involved. Other and important subjects of legislation demand our attention, and to these the country demands that we shall devote ourselves; and, depending on the strength of the case as it is presented by the minority report, or rather on the weakness of the case as disclosed by the record on which the majority report rests, I now move that the subject be laid on the table.

President's Message.

SPEECH OF HON. REVERDY JOHNSON, OF MARYLAND,
IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
December 12, 1867.

The Senate having under consideration the concurrent resolution introduced by Mr. DRAKE relative to the President's annual message—

Mr. JOHNSON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The resolution offered by the honorable member from Missouri proposes to censure the President of the United States for certain expressions found in his annual message of the 3d of this month. He has quoted those words in the resolution, and that the Senate may have the subject fully before them I ask the Secretary to do me the favor to read the words.

THE SECRETARY. The words quoted are as follows:

"Are not only objectionable for their assumption of ungranted power, but many of their provisions are in conflict with the direct prohibitions of the Constitution" and "as plainly unconstitutional as any that can be imagined."

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Missouri, from an elaborate message relating to the concerns of our country at home and abroad, has selected these words, and these alone, as calling for the censure which he proposes to have pronounced upon the President by the two Houses of Congress. The resolution, therefore, presents for the consideration of the Senate and of the country two questions: the first is whether the President had not a constitutional right to address those words to Congress; the other is, if he had not, whether the measure proposed is a fit and proper one.

Before addressing myself to either of these propositions I beg permission to correct what I think are constitutional heresies in the elaborate speech the honorable member delivered in support of this resolution. If I understand the principles contained in that speech, and especially those in a letter which the honorable gentleman has done me the honor to address me through the public press, they are that there are no rights which can be called in any proper sense sovereign in any of the States of the Union; that the supreme authority over people everywhere in relation to all things is in the Government of the United States, and especially in its legislative department. A reference to the circumstances which caused the Convention of 1787, to the deliberations of that body, and to those of the several State conventions by which the Constitution was finally ratified, will, I think, demonstrate that the honorable member in these respects is wholly and mischievously in error.

When the Colonies declared their independence of England and resolved by force of arms to maintain it, they became at once sovereign and independent States. This would have been the result of that declaration if it had been silent upon the subject; but it is not silent. After giving to the world the reasons for resisting the power of England and ending, and as they hoped forever, the allegiance which they antecedently owed to that kingdom, they stated in conclusion that henceforth and forever the States would be free and independent and vested with all the powers belonging to free and independent Governments. During the period of that struggle the Colonies, then States, were kept together by the exigencies in which they were all involved. The war upon which their fate depended could only be successfully carried on by joint efforts, and the war itself, the necessity growing out of it and the object for which it was waged, constituted during the period of the struggle a bond of Union, which enabled them triumphantly to emerge from the conflict.

Soon after the commencement of the war, however, it was found necessary that there should be some form of government operative upon all the States collectively, and the Articles of Confederation with that view were adopted; but those articles were the acts of free and independent States. They constituted but a treaty or a league between the States, and were no more binding upon them separately than is a treaty binding which is entered into between nations wholly distinct from each other.

At the termination of the conflict the great men of that day soon became convinced that the struggles through which they had passed, the blood and the treasure expended in the grand effort to establish upon this continent a free and independent Republic, would be frustrated unless some form of government was adopted, not only in name but in fact a Government; a Government vested with powers adequate to its own preservation; a Government, therefore, authorized to enforce those powers, not through the instrumentality of other Governments, but directly upon the citizen individually; and above all, having the authority absolutely necessary to maintain the interests of all against the nations elsewhere, and to prevent conflicts among the States themselves.

But no member of the Convention during the deliberations which terminated in the recommendation of the Constitution to the American people, ever intimated that it was their purpose or that it was desirable to extinguish the States as free and independent governments. On the contrary, every leading man who participated in the debates admitted that a people so numerous as then inhabited a country as extensive as ours then was, could only be governed successfully and in accordance with social and individual liberty through the joint instrumentality of a general government and the governments of the States. So far from designing to absorb all the powers of the States belonging to them at the time of the adoption of the Constitution in the Government of the United States, it was in the Convention and everywhere conceded that only such portion of the powers then possessed by the States should be transferred to the Government of the United States, as was necessary and adequate to maintain our independence against the world and preserve peace among ourselves. When the Constitution was submitted to the people of the several States assembled in convention, under the authority of each State, for adoption or rejection, it was apprehended, and there was cause for the apprehension, that the work upon which the hearts of the great and patriotic men of the day were fixed would fail, because it was supposed that the people of several of the States might believe that the practical result of the Constitution would be the absorption of all State power in general government.

Virginia, the first to propose the Convention, whose great men were among the earliest to point out the hazards to which we were then liable from the condition of things then existing—Virginia now, in the estimation of some, supposed to be out of the Union by means of a war waged for the purpose of preserving it unbroken—by some of her sons in her State convention, and particularly by Patrick Henry, whose matchless eloquence and burning patriotism during the earlier periods of the revolutionary struggle had stirred the American heart and aroused it to the necessity of appealing to arms and of dying in the effort to maintain independence, opposed the ratification of the Constitution upon the ground that by construction powers would be implied not delegated, and the result would be to absorb everything within the jurisdiction of the General Government; and the failure to adopt it there and in other States was imminent. Unless the history of the times is altogether false, that failure would have occurred but for the understanding with its friends and opponents that at the earliest possible moment after the organization of the Government amendments would be adopted which would accomplish all the purposes that the opponents of the Constitution supposed to be vital to social and individual liberty just as effectually as would have been the case if the Constitution had been accompanied by a declaration of rights.

In consequence of this understanding several of the States, and Virginia particularly, ratified it, and that understanding (for the men of that day were true to their pledges) was faithfully carried out by the adoption at the earliest possible period of ten of the amendments which now constitute a portion of our organic law. The first eight of these amendments relate to the individual rights of the citizen. The remaining two were inserted for the purpose of guarding against any possible construction that would give to the Government of the Union powers which might be exerted to the prejudice of such rights or to the prejudice of the rights of the States. The first was accomplished by providing that the rights secured by the Constitution were not to be considered as depriving the citizens of the States from all their other rights not expressly surrendered. The purpose of the second was accomplished by providing—I do not give the words of the amendment—that notwithstanding the powers conferred upon the General Government they were not in any way to affect the rights of the States, but that, on the contrary, all powers before belonging to them or to their people not delegated to the General Government were reserved to the States respectively and to the people. And from that day to this, with the exception of some statesmen within the last five years, including my honorable friend from Missouri, it has been the received doctrine that the sovereignty of the United States is confined to the subjects specially or by fair implication conferred upon that Government, and that in no manner, for no purpose, and to no extent, was the sovereignty of the States in relation to the powers not so delegated to the General Government affected, but, on the contrary, remained, as far as such powers were concerned, as absolutely in the States as they were anterior to the adoption of the Constitution.

In the Supreme Court of the United States, from the period of its organization to the present hour, during the administration of the many great and patriotic men who have adorned that tribunal, this has been held with entire unanimity to be the true interpretation of the Constitution in every case in which it became the duty of the court to pronounce its judgment upon it. In the celebrated case of The State of Maryland vs. McCulloch, involving the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in the luminous and eloquent opinion delivered by him in the name of the court, stated the doctrine in clear, precise, and positive terms, and substantially denounced the opposite doctrine as a heresy not only not warranted by a proper construction of the Constitution, but fatal to the very objects which its framers had in view.

The honorable member from Missouri, therefore, is utterly mistaken if he supposes, as he seems to do, that within the sphere of the powers not delegated by the States to the Government of the United States the former are not free and independent sovereignties; and I was a little surprised to find that he entertains a different opinion on receiving the letter to which I have referred and by listening to his speech delivered in this Chamber in support of his resolution. Somewhat conversant with the public men of the country, and having lived to a period and been placed in positions which rendered it necessary to make myself acquainted, as far as I was able, with the political opinions of the leading men of the day, I was brought to the conclusion by what I thought I knew were the sentiments of the honorable member from Missouri, that he agreed with me that there were State rights which it was the duty of the States at all hazards to maintain; and above all did I so think from the proceedings of a convention to which I will now refer. The honorable gentleman was a conspicuous member of the body which framed the constitution that for weal or woe now governs the people of Missouri. In that instrument there are provisions involving sovereignty in its most absolute sense, and, indeed, some which seem to me to be at war with any rightful sovereignty of man over man.

That convention undertook to step between the ministers of our holy religion and their disciples, and to deny them the privilege of administering their holy functions to erring and sinning man at any period of his existence from his cradle to his grave, by demanding as a preliminary to the exercise of that function that he should take an oath the nature of which I forbear to speak of. True to the spirit of the martyrs who from time to time have by their sufferings even unto death testified to their convictions of the truth of the Christian faith, they refused to submit, were in many cases prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment for having ventured, as against the alleged sovereignty of Missouri, to baptize infancy, confirm the adult, minister to the sick, give the consolations of our faith to the dying, and bury the dead. If those powers were rightfully exerted—and it is not for me in this debate to question it—it could only be because there was in the people of Missouri, in their capacity of a State, sovereign and almost absolute power. I commend, therefore, my friend, the honorable member, to reexamine his opinions, if they are what I suppose them to be, to see whether those which he entertained at a former period are not correct and his present opinions wholly erroneous.

MR. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator from Maryland permit me a moment's interruption?

MR. JOHNSON. If you desire it. I should prefer going on, though.

MR. DRAKE. I regret very much to ask it; but I should like at this point to say one word.

MR. JOHNSON. Certainly.

MR. DRAKE. I simply wish to say, Mr. President, with regard to the illustration which the honorable Senator has used from the constitution of Missouri, that in the convention which framed that constitution I opposed with all my might the particular provision that he refers to, did everything that mortal man could do in a body of that kind to prevent its adoption, but it was adopted in spite of me.

MR. JOHNSON. That may be, Mr. President; but that in no manner affects the purpose for which I refer to it. I do not understand the honorable member as now telling us that he objected to it on the ground of any want of sovereignty in the people of Missouri. I refer to it merely to establish that in the judgment of that convention there was in that State sovereign and independent powers wholly irrespective of the powers conferred upon the General Government when these were not restricted by the provisions of the latter.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

President's Message—Mr. Johnson.

SENATE.

Mr. President, this detail of the origin and subsequent history of the Constitution I have troubled the Senate with, because, in my judgment, it bears immediately upon the question before us, and which I proceed now to examine. The resolution states, substantially, that the expressions in the President's message, quoted in the resolution of the honorable member, are in conflict with the constitutional rights and authority of Congress, transcend his constitutional prerogatives, and are calculated to excite resistance to the laws; and almost intimates that they were so designed. Now what are the facts? or rather, what is the Constitution in its bearing upon the inquiry? In express terms the powers conferred upon the legislative department of the Government are stated to be only those that are delegated in the first article. In the second place, the powers conferred upon the Executive by the second article are, as stated in the very beginning of that article, "the executive power" of the Government, without any detail of the subjects upon which such power is to be exerted, as in the case in relation to the legislative department. And, in the third article, relating to the judicial department, only such cases are submitted as are specially enumerated. With regard, then, to the legislative and judicial departments, the powers vested in them are to be found in the articles constituting them. With regard to the executive department, the question as to the extent of its power depends upon the fact whether the power in question in its nature is executive, and not restricted by some of the express guarantees or prohibitions in the Constitution.

But the President is not only invested with the executive power in general terms, but he is made a partaker in the legislation of the country; not invested with the authority to originate, but with the power to approve or to reject; and no law passed by Congress in the contingency of his failing to approve is of any validity unless passed by the majority which the Constitution provides for such a case—two thirds. He has also the power (and so far the executive authority which would belong to him in the absence of that provision is limited) to negotiate treaties and appoint officers, subject only to the approval of the Senate. Further, the sole responsibility under which he is placed with regard to the Congress of the United States is that if he commits treason or bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors he may be impeached by the House of Representatives, a majority voting to that end, and be tried by the Senate sitting in a judicial capacity, presided over by the Chief Justice of the United States, and is by the Constitution considered to be innocent unless upon such a trial he is convicted by two thirds of its members. And, lastly, he is to continue in office for a period of four years, clothed with the entire business of negotiating with foreign Governments, of watching over the interests of all the people of all the States, elected by the people of all the States, (if that can be accomplished,) bound to see that the Constitution and laws of the United States are faithfully executed; and he is from time to time when Congress shall have assembled, to communicate to them the condition of the country, and to advise such measures as he may deem necessary to promote the common interest and the general welfare.

Now what has he done? What are called the military reconstruction bills did not receive his approval. He was not bound to approve them. It would have been a clear dereliction of duty if he had approved them with the opinion which we have no right to suppose he did not sincerely entertain. He therefore objected, and his objections were overruled by the majority which the Constitution requires. In the messages transmitted to Congress accompanying his disapproval of those bills he assigned as a reason not only that they were unconstitutional, in conflict with the sovereign rights of the States upon which they were to operate, but also inconsistent and fatal to the guaranteed rights of the individual citizens within their limits, and would prove in their effect to be seriously mischievous. It is not for us to say that he did this in any captious spirit, or from any other motive than the same motive which the honorable member from Missouri has told us governed him in propounding this resolution—a sense of duty.

When the bills were passed, objectionable in his judgment both upon grounds of constitutionality and expediency, he had to decide whether it was not his duty to see to their execution. That duty he met. At the earliest moment that he could take a step looking to that end he appointed for each of the military districts commanders, and selected them from the most gallant and patriotic officers of the Army. I knew it was apprehended, as I had some reason to believe, by some members of this body who had not the confidence in the President that I had, and still have, that he would not execute these laws. Their fears have proved to be unfounded. They have been executed. No man, as I think, can successfully lay his hand upon a single fact which demonstrates that he had any other intention than to see to their faithful execution. It is possible he may have misapprehended their meaning; he may have put upon them an interpretation which Congress, or a majority of Congress, may think erroneous; but that he gave to them a meaning and an interpretation which he believed they were alone capable of I think will not be denied by any gentleman of this body who is sensible, as I trust we all are, of the courtesy which belongs to the coördinate departments of the Government.

A year passes. We assembled on the 2d of the present month. The practical operation of these laws he from day to day had witnessed, or rather had understood by information upon which he had a right to rely. His constitutional opinions on the subject of their validity communicated by him to Congress when they passed had undergone no change. What was he to do? If he was right constitutionally in sending to us his message stating the grounds upon which he disapproved of such laws, which are substantially the same as those stated in the message, a portion of which it is now proposed to censure, it was his right, and, in my opinion, his clear duty, to restate them. And, if he believed that their operation had proved disastrous to the country, it was also his duty to communicate that opinion to Congress.

The honorable member from Missouri, I think, would have been much better employed (if he will pardon me for using such words in reference to any conduct of his) if, instead of offering a resolution to censure the President, he had in debate attempted to answer the message. It would indeed have been a harder task, and have required all the ability of the honorable member, than to draft a resolution censuring the President; but it would have been more in accordance, in my view, with his duty as a Senator, and to the obligation which he owes to the people of the United States, if, instead of censuring, he had replied and demonstrated, if he could, the errors into which the President, as he supposes, had fallen. That message is before the people of the country. The President and those who differ with him in regard to the doctrines which it contains are now in the presence of that high tribunal, to be judged as it may think proper; and the President, judging from the signs of the times, has no particular reason to be apprehensive of the result.

But, if his doctrines would imperil the safety of the country or hazard the rights of any of our people, it is our duty, such of us as may so think, to let that be known in the debates in this Chamber; to answer and not censure him. Answer him, the people will say, not—I was about to use a word which perhaps I ought not to use—not vilify him. Answer him by proving that the measures are constitutional; that we had a right to adopt them; and, that done, an intelligent and patriotic people will say to us, "You are right: the President is wrong: your conduct we will approve: his we will disapprove, and by disapproving censure."

But, Mr. President, the honorable member throughout his speech spoke of the legislative department as clothed with supreme authority. Supreme in what? Supreme over what? Not in regard to the Executive; not over the Executive. He is as entirely independent of that department when he moves within the sphere of his own functions as we are independent of him when we move within our legitimate sphere. We have no more right to censure him in terms of reproach, assailing his character as a man or an officer, than he has the right to censure us, to assail our characters as men and officers of a common constituency.

I do not think, sir, I can be mistaken in my recollection, but I believe the honorable member from Missouri held in high esteem and was a constant supporter of that man who had so strong a hold on the affections of the American people, once the President of the United States, Andrew Jackson.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member was not I should be glad to have him so state.

Mr. DRAKE. I was not a supporter of General Jackson.

Mr. JOHNSON. At any time?

Mr. DRAKE. At any time; though if I had known as much in those days as I know now perhaps I might have been.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to say that. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. But it would have been, if the honorable member will permit me to say so, because he was an invincible champion of the Union and the deadly foe of the very doctrine which the honorable Senator is now proclaiming on this floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I learn that for the first time. I rather think that the reading of my honorable friend from Missouri has been more affected during the last eight or ten years than mine has been by impaired sight.

Mr. DRAKE. Does the honorable Senator remember his proclamation against South Carolina nullification?

Mr. JOHNSON. Perfectly.

Mr. DRAKE. There, sir, is all the doctrine that I am contending for.

Mr. JOHNSON. And I remember his veto of the United States Bank bill; and over and above all, his protest against the authority of the Senate to pass a resolution censuring him for an act of his as President of the United States.

Mr. DRAKE. Not, if the honorable member please, an act done by him toward the Senate of the United States, but outside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland give way to the interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON. I give way, sir, to any interruption. It only lengthens, perhaps, the time that I should otherwise tax the patience of the Senate; but if the honorable member has any explanation to make from time to time I hope he will not hesitate in asking permission to make it. Certainly, as far as I am concerned, it will be granted.

Mr. DRAKE. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon for interrupting him at all. I did not wish to do it, and would not have done it but that the honorable Senator called upon me, and this little dialogue ensued.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not object to it. The relations between the honorable member and myself are such—and I am glad to say they are equally friendly with every member of the body—that he never will receive at my hands anything but what will be most cheerfully rendered, the greatest courtesy.

Mr. DRAKE. Nor you from me any other.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not doubt it.

Now, Mr. President, the foundation upon which this resolution rests, if it has any, is, that the President of the United States is responsible to the legislative department of the Government if he commits errors, whether designed or not, interfering in the judgment of that department, with its own legitimate authority. The honorable member told us in the course of his speech that the meaning of a law, its proper interpretation, is a fact. If he meant to say that it was a fact whether there had been an interpretation or not, or a meaning given to it or not, he is right. But if he meant to say that there was anything like a question of fact in the proposition whether the law has been properly construed or not, he is in error. That is a question of law, and to be answered by all to whom it is addressed, by Congress, by the President, by the judiciary, and by every citizen subject to the responsibility of suffering, if he attempts to violate it, if he turns out to be in error himself as to that interpretation.

SENATE.

President's Message—Mr. Johnson.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

President Jackson, whose doctrines the honorable member says with the lights he now has he would support, and would have supported at that time if he had been then so illuminated, states his view of the rights of the coordinate departments of the Government in the message accompanying his veto of the Bank bill of the 10th of July, 1832, an extract from which I will read:

"If the opinion of the Supreme Court covered the whole ground of this act it ought not to control the coordinate authorities of this Government. The Congress, the Executive, and the court must each for itself be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution."

I suppose the honorable member from Missouri will not question that this is the true constitutional doctrine; and yet I submit to him and to the Senate whether it is not in direct conflict with the one which he has attempted to inculcate upon this body. The President, vested with almost transcendent executive power, constituted in one respect, and to a certain extent, a part of the legislative power vested with the authority to negotiate treaties and make appointments, subject to the approval of the Senate, to see to the faithful execution of the laws, and sworn to protect, preserve, and defend the Constitution of the United States. Jackson tells us, and tells us truly, that the President in the discharge of his duties is as absolute and independent with reference to such questions as is the Supreme Court or Congress. What is the consequence of this absolute independence? The right to judge whether a law proposed to be passed, or passed notwithstanding his objections, is in conflict with the Constitution. The Constitution nowhere says that he is to surrender his opinions upon that question because two thirds of Congress entertain a different opinion. The action of the two thirds only gives vitality to the law as far as the President is concerned, and makes it only as operative as it would have been if passed by a bare majority and received his approval; but it no more concludes his right to entertain and express an opinion as to its constitutionality than it concludes the right of any member of Congress who may have been in a minority upon its passage or any judge to entertain and express the same opinion. The passage of the law in no manner modifies the Constitution.

The passage of a law is, when the question is fairly presented to a tribunal authorized to pass upon it judicially, no evidence at all, except by force of the courtesy which is due to any department of the Government, that it is constitutional. When it comes into debate before a judicial tribunal, or before a legislative forum, or before the Executive, when he is called upon to discharge an executive function expressly assigned him, it is the right and the duty of the courts collectively and individually, of the members of Congress collectively and individually, and of the President, to entertain and express the opinion that the law has no warrant in the Constitution. That is all that the President has done in this instance; and for having done it the honorable member says he should be censured, because, after the laws were passed by the majority provided by the Constitution, it was a question at once and forever placed beyond his jurisdiction. That Mr. Jefferson entertained the same opinion with General Jackson is evident from his letter of June 2, 1807, to Mr. Hay, in which he said:

"In the cases of Callendar and others the judges determined the seditious act was valid under the Constitution, and exercised their regular powers of sentencing them to fine and imprisonment. But the Executive determined that the seditious act was a nullity under the Constitution, and exercised his regular power of prohibiting the execution of the sentence, or rather of executing the real law, which protected the acts of the defendants. From these different constructions of the same act by different branches less mischief arises than from giving to any one of them a control over the others."

This was clearly General Jackson's view. A Bank of the United States was chartered in 1790, rechartered in 1811, and chartered again in 1832, and this last act was submitted for his approval; and he then, referring to the Bank in existence as well as to the Bank proposed to be continued, assailed each upon the ground that it had no warrant in the Constitution; and he was sustained, or rather not overruled, by the requisite majority. Did he doubt, did any member of the Congress of that day doubt, that it was not only his right but his duty to withhold his approval if he was sincere in his conviction that Congress had no authority to pass it? Not one. And what made that case infinitely stronger than the one before us is, that in two causes brought before the Supreme Court that court unanimously held that Congress had the right to pass such a law. He therefore said: "I know it; I know that Congress did in 1790 and 1811 pass a law for that purpose; I know that it has passed the law before me for approval; but while the court is independent of me as President of the United States in the discharge of its own appropriate functions, and while the Congress of the United States is also independent of me if two thirds of its members differ from me in the particular discharge of any of its functions, I as President am not bound to submit my judgment to the judgment of either;" and nobody pretended that he was; no one moved a vote of censure, mild or severe.

The Bank fell and was never afterward revived; and yet what was done by the President in that instance was much more objectionable, because of the authority which he overruled, than what President Johnson has done in the existing case in the passages selected for censure by the honorable member.

In the one case the interpretation of the Supreme Court was disregarded totally, though given in two instances and with absolute unanimity and maintained by a power of reasoning never surpassed and hardly ever equaled. The greatest men of the land then adorning our country in both Chambers of Congress entertained and acted upon the same opinion. Every court in the land, in every State in the Union, had maintained the same doctrine that the Bank was constitutional. But that man of iron will, true to what he believed to be his duty—whether he was in error or not is immaterial—vested with the power to do what he believed was his duty notwithstanding courts and Congresses, vetoed the bill of 1832 upon the ground that it violated the Constitution. I have said that case is infinitely stronger than the one before us. Am I not right in this? What court in the land has adjudged that the acts objected to by the President are constitutional? None that I know of.

What intelligent man in the country has asserted that they are not in fact at war with some of the express restrictions of the Constitution? What intelligent man has pretended that they are not in palpable violation of many of the guarantees of human and individual liberty contained in the first eight of the Amendments? And finally, what man has ventured to express the opinion that they are not absolutely antagonistic with the provisions contained in the tenth Amendment? I know of none. Their warrant, if they have any—and I do not propose to discuss that question—the ground upon which they have been supported, has been that with reference to the States and the people of the States to which they were made applicable, the guarantees of individual liberty and of State rights contained in the ninth and tenth Amendments have no operation whatever, they having fallen by reason of the war; that as States they have no existence, and as men they possess no individual rights embraced by any of the guarantees to which I have referred; that they are amenable by reason of the war, and by virtue of the war alone, and are bound to submit to the absolute and uncontrolled will of the legislative department.

Now, that President Johnson should entertain with all proper respect to Congress a different opinion ought not to surprise any one; that he should honestly entertain that opinion should not surprise any one; and if he did, the judgment of his country and of the world, if the world shall take any interest in our troubles, will pronounce that he not only does not deserve censure for what he has done, but is entitled to the highest praise, because if he had failed to do what he has done he would have been recreant to his clear and sworn duty.

I could discuss the question much further, Mr. President, if I was not sensible that I should weary the kind indulgence of the Senate; and I therefore leave it, and have but a word to say upon the second proposition which I suppose the resolution involves: have we the right, if he had no constitutional power to send such a message to us containing the selected words, to censure him for so doing? In the first place, let me submit to the honorable member from Missouri to consider what may be the consequences to the fair fame of the country of a war of crimination and recrimination between the two departments of the Government.

In what light will we exhibit ourselves to the world, whose citizens and subjects in the mass are looking with solicitude to the success of what from the beginning of our efforts to the present time has been called our great experiment? The President at war with Congress, Congress at war with the President; to use one of the metaphors (if metaphor it can be called) adopted by the honorable member from Missouri, becoming, in the slang language of "the ring," shoulder-hitters, striking, kicking at each other, in the face of our own people and the civilized world! They will see that the message which the President has sent to us is in the discharge of an express duty imposed upon him by the Constitution. They will see that to censure him for so doing is to deny to the Executive the exercise of his rightful authority. They will see that such a denial takes from the Constitution of the United States one of its most obvious advantages, one of its chiefest benefits, the existence of a high functionary selected for the purpose by the will of the American people, placed over the whole for the exercise of all the powers conferred upon him, and therefore able from the very nature of those powers more particularly to be informed of the state of the country and to give to Congress the benefit incident to his situation. I think, as I have just said, the world will say that for the words for which we are called upon to censure him he deserves praise. I think the people will regret that in the Senate of the United States one of its most distinguished members, in the metaphorical language in the use of which throughout his speech he was so exceedingly felicitous, instead of awarding praise to him, represented him as a "presidential nightmare crouched upon the heaving bosom of the nation." I think that they are now coming to the opinion that he has to the full measure of his ability been a wise and a faithful servant. I believe that they will accord to him eminent ability as displayed in the several messages which from time to time he has transmitted to Congress, and especially in the message which we are now asked to censure.

Reconstruction—Mr. Brooks.

HO. OF REPS.

Without being guilty of the sin of extravagant eulogy, as always in bad taste and offensive to its object, if he deserves eulogy at all I think that message is equal to any message sent to Congress by any President of the many illustrious men who have adorned the executive office; and that when we and he are tenants of our respective graves, and history takes up the subject of his administration and examines the messages to which I have adverted and his conduct throughout, it will record as is due that he did all that he was able to do to fulfill the obligations of his official oath to "preserve, protect, and defend" the Constitution of his country.

Mr. President, in the protest to which I adverted a few moments since, President Jackson denied, and as I think by a force of reasoning never successfully met, the jurisdiction of this body to censure him for any official act, unless such censure was involved in some executive function which it was called upon to discharge, or in some legislative duty. In that protest he said that by the proceeding of which he complained the Senate "convert themselves into accusers, witnesses, counsel, and judges, and prejudice the whole case." He says, further, speaking of the relations of the different departments of the Government:

"In every other respect each of them is the coequal of the other two, and all are the servants of the American people, without power or right to control or censure each other in the service of their common superior, save only in the manner and to the degree which that superior has prescribed."

The honorable member should take warning by the results of that controversy. The resolution of censure was proposed by Mr. Clay, whose name I can never mention but with reverence and admiration. He was impulsive, strong-willed, of masculine understanding, and of the purest patriotism, but he could "bear no brother near the throne." On the 26th of December, 1833, he proposed this resolution:

"Resolved, That the President in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws and in derogation of both."

The majority of the Senate were a long time in concluding that it was their province and was expedient to pass that resolution. It was offered, as I have stated, on the 26th of December, 1833. It was held under deliberation and the subject of constant debate from that time to the 28th of March, 1834, when it was finally adopted by a vote of 26 yeas to 20 nays. In a few years some of the men who passed it ceased to be members of this body. I beg my friend from Missouri to take warning by the example. The American people rallied around their chosen chief. The press of the country and the friends of the Administration called upon the people to "watch the Senate." The revolution went on; and on the 16th of January, 1837, the following resolution, which had been previously submitted by Mr. Benton, was passed by a vote of 24 yeas to 19 nays:

"Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the Journal, and for that purpose that the Secretary of the Senate, at such time as the Senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript Journal of the session of 1833-34 into the Senate, draw black lines around the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the following words: 'Expunged by order of the Senate this 16th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1837.'"

Now, I submit to my friend from Missouri whether it would be altogether exceedingly palatable or amusing to him some year or two hence to have his resolution put into mourning; whether, if he then be a member of this body, as I hope he may be, he will not regret that in a moment of patriotic enthusiasm, governed, without being aware of it, by the influence of party, not conscious of it, because I am sure he was sincere in saying that he offered it solely from a sense of duty, he will not feel a little sensitive when he finds his resolution brought upon the desk of the President of the Senate, and he, perhaps, called upon by the Senate—who can, I suppose, call upon a member to perform the task—to draw black lines around it as an evidence that, in the judgment of the Senate and the country, it would be derogatory to the dignity of the body to permit such a resolution to constitute a part of its archives.

Now, Mr. President, I say in all kindness to the honorable member that if there is no such heaving upon the bosom of the nation as he supposed, and brought about by the cause to which he referred it, the indications of the day are that there is a heaving going on which promises to increase from day to day. It commenced, I believe, in the State so ably represented by my friend who sits near me [Mr. MORRILL, of Maine] and by his colleague, slight in comparison.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very slight.

Mr. JOHNSON. But still a rumbling which indicated that an earthquake might happen. It again was heard from the shores of the Pacific; it became more violent in October in Pennsylvania and Ohio. It became still more violent in the succeeding November in New York and New Jersey; and all the indications we have had since show that it has not subsided but is yet going on. Even Massachusetts, who has been indoctrinated by the learning and the eloquence of the honorable member who sits farthest from me, [Mr. SUMNER,] and by the power and ability of his colleague, [Mr. WILSON,] seems to be in motion. Now, being very anxious to retain the association in this body of the honorable member the mover of this resolution, I warn him in a spirit of sincere regard to take heed of this heaving, that he may escape its fury, and the only way to avert it is to remove the causes which have led to it. If he declines to do this, he and all who shall so decline, will, I think, in November next be hurled into utter and irretrievable ruin, not physical but political—physical, every member of the Senate would mourn, but political ruin to my honorable friend, in the contingency of his undertaking to resist it, would be borne by many members on this side of the Chamber with all becoming and decent fortitude.

A word more and I shall have done. I again submit to the honorable member, and through him to the Senate, if the necessities of the country and the duties which these impose upon us, do not demand a different description of conduct; whether the people are not looking to us anxiously not to carry on a war with the President, (which can result in no possible good to them or anybody else,) but to apply ourselves exclusively to the duties belonging to the times, restore peace to our distracted land, revise our system of taxation—miserably inefficient as far as the Treasury is concerned, but heavily oppressive upon the people—affecting every branch of human industry. Let us so revise it that it may operate as lightly upon the people as is consistent with the obligation upon us of meeting the demands upon the Government. And, above all, let us see to it that we maintain unbroken the plighted faith and preserve unsullied the honor of the nation.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES BROOKS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 18, 1867.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, from the "Reconstruction Committee" of the House of Representatives, having, December 18, reported a bill, first, to change the majority of all registered votes in the southern States into a majority of the actual voters on the day the constitutions were voted upon; second, to give seven of the southern States ten more Representatives in Congress than under the apportionment of 1850; and third, to elect the members of Congress the day on which the constitutions were voted upon—and the second proposition having been withdrawn on the earnest opposition of Mr. BRIGHAM—

Mr. BROOKS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question of reconstruction, like Banquo's ghost, can never be laid. In the ominous ides of March, just before the opening of this, the Fortieth Congress, (not to go any further back,) we had a bill for reconstruction. In July last, in the summer solstice, an extraordinary session of Congress was called, for the purpose of again "enacting" "reconstruction." And now here, among the very earliest measures of the present session, we have brought before us the third bill to "reconstruct."

THE SOUTHERN NEGRO MAN TO HAVE MORE REPRESENTATION THAN THE WESTERN WHITE MAN.

They who have reported this bill have already, at the very outset, struck it a fatal blow by exhibiting a division in their own ranks as the result of which it became necessary for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw one of the most important parts—the section to increase the number of negro Representatives in Congress from the South. In deference to the protest of a member of their own organization from a western State, the proposition to give ten additional Representatives to the slaveholding States—I mean white slaveholding States, no longer negro slaveholding States—has been withdrawn, because such negro favoritism would have startled the great white-growing West. The State of California, which, though its population has immensely increased since the last census, has now only three Representatives on this floor with a voting population of 120,000—a representative population then of over 600,000. The people of Iowa with a population of 674,000 by the last census of 1860, now have by State census 967,000. The people of Michigan with a population according to the last census of only 600,000, now have probably 1,000,000. The people of Kansas with a population by the last census of 106,000 now have 400,000. The people of Minnesota with a population by the last census of 169,000 now have 400,000.

The Committee on Reconstruction, blind to all this white increase, reported an increase of ten Representatives in Congress for the negro States, but no increase whatsoever for these great white-growing communities of the West! It would have been an irresistible argument, then, before the white people of the West to say, "Congress has increased the negro representation of the South, while it has allowed nothing for the million and a half increased population of California, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, and Kansas." The Reconstruction Committee reported in favor of all this, but the honorable gentleman from Ohio hit it on the head and affrighted the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] out of this iniquitous inequality, thus discriminating against the whites, the moment it was fairly shown up above water. Overawed for once by opinion he abandoned his negroes and stood by his own race and color. The will was there to start the iniquity, but the pluck has failed him to carry it out. The white people of this country thus, thank God, are at last recovering, in some small degree, their proper consideration, if not respectability, among certain members of the House.

TO ENABLE THE BARE MAJORITY OF A MINORITY FOREVER TO GOVERN.

Sir, the first proposition now before the House is to change the organic law, as it is called, of reconstruction, to abandon the established principles of the March and July acts of Congress, that the majority of the registered voters shall vote for a constitution, by limiting the vote now to voters only on the day of election.

Ho. OF REPS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Brooks.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

The object of this change is not all apparent, a concealed object being to disfranchise more and more of the white population, and to enable a bare majority of an actual minority to frame the organic law of the State. It was not enough under the two last reconstruction bills that they disfranchised thousands, ay, tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of white voters, while they enfranchised the whole black population, who were as deep in practical rebellion as their masters, for this bill now disfranchises thousands and tens of thousands more. It invites now and enables all the negro-constitution mongers of the South to disfranchise whites enough in every southern State to secure the government thereof to the negroes.

THE CONSTITUTION OF ALABAMA,

the first framed by the negro conventions, unfolds the meaning of this act, and shows how Anglo-Saxon white States are to be converted into African States, the declared intent and meaning of that so-called constitution being to disfranchise every white man in the South who has any respect left for his own noble Anglo-Saxon race, and who will not forswear himself forever to secure in perpetuity the superiority and reign of negro blood.

THE NEGRO TEST-OATH OF ALABAMA.

Under that constitution of Alabama every voter is compelled to swear that he will never, under any circumstances, have it so amended as to prohibit negroes from voting. No one is allowed to be a voter who will not commit himself forever to the principle that negroes shall be the rulers of the State. The provision I allude to is embodied in the new constitution, article seventh, section fourth, in the test-oath there:

"That I accept the civil and political equality of all men"—

Negro men, nothing is said of women!

"and agree not to attempt to deprive any person or persons of any race or color, on account of previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men."

Before any person can vote, then, in the State of Alabama under that constitution he is bound to devote himself by oath for all time to negroes and to negro voting, to fellow negro soldiers, to negro jurymen, to negro and white mongrel schools and school-houses, to mongrel cars, to mongrel taverns, to a complete mongrel social existence from the cradle to the grave. No man can vote unless he takes that unnatural, that horrid oath, and thus forswears his own white race and color. I appeal to the States of Minnesota, to Wisconsin, to Kansas, to the great Northwest, that have just been voting negro suffrage down—to Ohio, to Pennsylvania, to every northern State which has refused suffrage to the negroes among them, who are ten times more intelligent than the besotted, just-freed negro slaves of the southern country, who scarcely know their own names as they vote, and I ask them all, "Will you trust to such negroes in eleven States the right to govern the whole country, through their Representatives upon this floor, for all time to come, now and forever, while you refuse the right to vote to your own people of African descent, ten times more intelligent than these just-freed slaves of the South?"

EVEN WHITE RADICAL ALABAMIANS TO BE OUTVOTED BY NEGROES.

Apart from all this, too, the constitution of Alabama has been deliberately so framed as to disfranchise or misrepresent a large portion of the white people of the northern part of that State. The State has fifty-nine counties and is apportioned off in this new constitution into one hundred Representatives, and that Alabama convention has deliberately affixed an apportionment in and upon the constitution so that 136,395 persons in southern negro Alabama are entitled to fifteen Representatives, while 391,444 persons in northern white Alabama, nearly three times the number in the negro counties, are given but thirty-five, when an equitable apportionment would have been forty-two—nearly forty-three—Representatives. So that by the very apportionment organic law of the State the white people of northern Alabama are crushed out by the negro vote of the southern part.

The constitution apportionment table is as follows:

Counties.	Representatives.	Negro Alabama.		No. of Representatives.
		Population.
3	Each 5.	77,047 negroes.
		59,348 whites.
		136,395		15
35	Each 1.	White Alabama.
		280,282 whites.
		111,159 negroes.
		391,441		35

You have not been content, then, in your two previous reconstruction acts in so arranging eight million southern white men as to enable four million negroes thereto govern them; but here in such constitutions as that of Alabama you are cheating your own white Radicals and subjecting them to irrecoverable negro dominion. Sir, the object of all your three bills, their real intent and meaning, is for all time so to organize this Government that four million negroes in the southern States shall hold a balance of power in the whole United States, there enslaving eight million white people to counteract the politically divided voting population of the twenty-four millions of the North, and thus to govern the whole.

IS THIS, OR IS IT NOT, A WHITE MAN'S GOVERNMENT?

My objection to this bill rises far higher than any mere details; it is to the whole principle throughout from beginning to end. My theory, my principle, and I believe the principle of the Democratic party, is one before which all other issues—tariffs, currency, taxes, armies, navies, all mere questions of the hour—dwindle into comparative insignificance. They are but passing questions, which live to-day and die to-morrow. The only real living issue towers above all these—and that is, Is this, or is it not, a white man's Government?

You have deliberately framed a bill to overthrow this white man's Government of our fathers and to erect an African Government in its stead; and it is because you have done this that I resist and protest against it, again and again, and from the beginning to the end.

THE NEGRO IS NOT THE EQUAL OF THE WHITE MAN.

The negro is not the equal of the white man, much less his master, as your bill makes him; and this I can demonstrate anatomically, physiologically, and psychologically too, if necessary. Volumes of scientific authority establish the fact; I might "pile Pelion on Ossa" to demonstrate it, if this were a hall of science for such discussions, or if there were time for such discussions here. All that I have opportunity to do here is in the fewest words possible to set forth scientific facts. The negro man differs more from the white man than a white man from a white woman, and the difference is essential, organic, throughout, from the crown of the head to the very sole of the foot. The negro is a different creature, with a different brain and different structural organization and in every respect inferior to the white governing man.

THE HAIR OR WOOL OF THE NEGRO.

The very hair which crowns his head is not hair, but it is wool, wool, and wool only. [Laughter.] He who will take the trouble to examine it through the microscope, micrometer, and microtome will see that its structure is that of wool and not of hair. The hair of a white man is cylindrical; the section under the microscope appears perfectly circular, and provided with a medullary canal, while the wool of the negro is flattened, so that its section exhibits an elongated ellipsis, in the axis of which no medullary canal is seen. It is this lateral compression which effects the peculiar frizzling of the hair, owing to its not taking place exactly in the direction of the longitudinal axis of the hair, but ascending in spirals, so that the hair resembles a spiral spring, which always returns to its shape when drawn out. (See M. Pruner Bey, De la Chevelure comme Caractéristique des Races Humaines, Carl Voght, et alios.)

THE SKULL, THE BRAIN, THE NECK, THE FOOT, ETC.

The difference is not only in the hair but it is in the whole anatomical structure of the head, inside and outside. The negro's face projects like a muzzle, and the teeth are obliquely inserted, so that their edges meet as at projecting angles. The development of the jaw (prognathism) is in direct relation or proportion to the intellectual capacity of a people, the prognathous being confined to the lowest races of men, among them the negro. Their cranial capacity is different. The volume of an American or English head is in cubic centimetres 1572—95, while that of the negro born in Africa is only 1371—42, and the place occupied in relation to cranial capacity and cerebral weight corresponds with the degree of intellectual capacity and civilization. The weight of the white man's brain is greater than that of the negro. The convolutions of the brain are different. The anterior and frontal lobes of the white man show a far better mental development. All these assertions are maintainable by high German, French, and English, as well as American authority; but this is not the place nor the hour for metaphysical or psychological discussion. Every feature of the white man and the negro differs. The nose is different. The nostrils of a Caucasian form two nearly rectangular triangles, the hypothenuses of which are turned outward, while the septum of the nose forms a perpendicular line common to the two triangles. On taking a similar view of the negro the nostrils present only a transverse aperture, or the figure of a horizontal eight united in the middle by the nasal septum. The form and size of the mouth, the shape of the lips and cheeks are very different. The apish chin of the negro differs very essentially from that of the white man. The facial angle of the distinguished writer, Camper, amounts in the negro to 70.75 degrees—it may sink to 65—while in the Caucasian it is rarely below 80, and frequently a few degrees higher. The negro's skull is thicker than the white man's, the cervical muscles more powerful, and hence the negro carries his burden on his head, and, like a ram in a fight, uses his skull. The negro's shoulder differs from the white man's. The negro's hand is larger, his fingers long and thin, palms flat, thumb balls scarcely prominent. "All the characters of his hand," says Carl Voght, "decidedly approach those of the simian hand." The leg, the calves of the leg, all differ from the white man's. "The femoral bones, as well as the fibula, seem curved outward, so that the knees are more apart from each other than in the white." The pelvis is organically different. "The foot of the negro," says Burmeister, "is in everything ugly—flat, of a projecting heel, a thick, flabby cushion in the inner cavity, with wide, spreading toes. The middle part of the foot does not touch the ground." Voght, the German physiologist, calls it "the foot of the gorilla, or, if you please, the posterior hand." I cite these facts to show that it is not the skin alone that parts the white from the negro race, not the dermis or epidermis, or pigment therein. I could not respect myself if I judged a race inferior to my own because of its color only, for color may be but an incident or accident of life. We have brunettes as well as blondes, and both among the most beautiful of our race. The Egyptian is not white, scarcely is the Italian or the Spaniard, in whose veins courses Moorish blood. The negro is no more of a colored man than Caucasians are colored men. I never use the absurd words "colored men." The negro is a negro, and only a negro—of a type, a race of men as different from ours as the Hottentot or the Bushman. God has created us anatomically and physiologically different in almost all respects, so far as we can judge never intending us to be equal or kindred men, and though of one blood, He has determined the bounds of their habitations, and never assuredly determined that an inferior race from Africa should govern, as set forth in this bill, here, in America, a superior race of men.

AMALGAMATION OR MISCEGENATION IN A GOVERNMENT COMPARTNERSHIP IS GOVERNMENT DESTRUCTION.

After entering so briefly and necessarily so imperfectly upon the anatomical and physical distinctions that part us from the negro—a discussion which might be extended to any length—I now ask the attention of the House, in as few words as possible, to certain historical facts; for this experiment of negro equality is no novelty in history. We are not the first negrophilists who have trodden over the old ground of amalgamation and miscegenation, and hence we have nothing new to offer in it or to expect from it. The experiment was tried hundreds of years ago, and it has been tried in our own time and in our own generation too. I will not allude to Hayti, where the negro is so wise that he will not admit the white man into the government of that country or even allow him to hold real estate there. I will not allude to Jamaica, where the negroes have managed their local Government so badly that the British authorities at home have taken the power of self-government from them, and redeposited it in the Crown, through a British governor and council; but I will go a little further and show from the great history of the world that the negro has not the capacity of self-government or of any species of popular government, and that wherever or whenever the superior race has shared government with him destruction has been the lot of both.

THE MULATTO WITH WHITE BLOOD IN HIS VEINS.

I speak not now of the mulatto, because the mulatto with white blood in his veins often has the intelligence and capacity of a white man. But for violating a law of God, that all are to be punished who indulge in a criminal admixture of races, so that beyond the third or fourth generation there can be no further mulatto progeny, I would admit the mulatto to the right of suffrage, if I could do it without violating that law or without establishing a principle which would be fatal to my own race. I recognize the mulatto's intelligence and capacity with our white blood flowing in his veins, and I know that he is often the equal and sometimes the superior of some white men.

THE CONGO NEGRO, ETC.

But the Congo negro, the Dahomey negro, the Guinea negro, the negro of the southern States, is no brother of ours, and God never made him for our brother. I do not say that he is only a higher species of the anthropoid apes, as some say, but I do say that the orang-outang is as intelligent as many of the Bushmen of southern Africa, and that the chimpanzee and the gorilla in their forms of creation wonderfully represent the ignorant and brutalized negro; and I will add that if we are to degrade this great Government of ours into a southern negro Congo Government, it is as well to take into the partnership the orang, the chimpanzee, and the gorilla as to go into this partnership with the sons of Congo, Soudan, and Dahomey, the native lands of them all, apes and men.

I do not mean in what I have said to refer to the mulatto, or quadroon, or octoroon, whose intelligence I respect by virtue of the white blood that runs in their veins, but to the pure Congo negro. I admit him to be a "man," but he is not a "brother" if he is a man, and I will never consent to divide self-government with him, or to degrade our own noble, historical race to his low level.

THE NEGRO UNCHANGED AND UNCHANGEABLE.

The negro is the same, and has been the same, for four thousand years. While all other races—our own race—emerging from barbarism, have been constantly improving the negro in Africa is to be seen now just as he was in the earliest periods of Egyptian record. In the frescoes or amid the tombs of Egypt, four thousand years old in all probability, the negro there exhibits the same pictured life he lives in now. His tough skull and strong muscles of the neck are carrying the same burden that he carries to this day. He was then the servant of the Egyptian man, the yellow man of Egypt, just as he is the servant of the Caucasian now. As Virgil described the race some two thousand years ago, when he wrote of an "Aunt Chloe" of his day, even so is the negro now:

"*Afra genus, tota patriam testante figura,
Torta comam, labroque tumens et lusea, colorem:
Pectora lata, jaceos mammas, compressor alvo,
Cruribus exilis, spatiosa prodiga planta;
Continuis rimis calcearea scissa rigeant.*"

I quote Cowper's translation, and I trust you, sir, will the more enjoy it as coming from an old abolition friend, who would have not a slave to till his grounds:

"*From Afric she, the swain's sole serving maid,
Whose face and form alike her birth betrayed:
With woolly locks, lips tumid, sable skin,
Wide bosom, udders flaccid, belly thin,
Legs slender, broad and most misshapen feet,
Chopped into chinks and parched with solar heat.*"

That is the description given by Virgil two thousand years ago; and that is the appearance of the negro of this day. In his own native land he has not improved, and he never will improve, save as he comes in close contact with civilization, and is forced to exercise his naturally imitative powers.

CIVILIZATION AND CHRISTIANITY HAVE NOT CHANGED HIM.

Four thousand years ago he was exactly what he is now, anno Domini 1867, and what he ever will be, save as he comes in contact with the civilization of a superior race. The Egyptians whose genius created the pyramids, the sphynx, the obelisk; the Carthaginian whose soldiers under Hannibal surmounted the then horrid Alps, rolled over the Campagna of Rome, and the plains of Capua; the Roman, whose arms and whose arts embraced the whole world—all have brought their civilization and their arts before the negro race, but all in vain. The Church had holy foundations in Carthage, in Cyrene, in Alexandria, throughout all Egypt, and far, far up the Nile, and ascetics from upper Egypt, clothed in the wild raiment of the Baptist, wandered forth in sheepskins and goatskins, and dwelt in deserts and on mountains, in dens and caves, to bring the negro to Christ, but all, all in vain. Pagan, savage, cannibal even, the negro in his own native home for thousands of years has defied all civilization, all Christianity; and only when in close individual contact with the superior race is the negro improved or improvable. He clings to his gregees, jujus, fetishism with as much pertinacity as he did hundreds of years ago. But a wonderful imitative genius is that of the negro! It displays itself surprisingly in music and in a variety of our culinary arts. When associated with the white man the negro, through his faculties of imitation, becomes in many occupations almost the equal of the white man. But when left to his own guidance, as in Hayti, in Jamaica, or in upper Egypt, he returns to his barbaric tastes, his gregees, his jujus, the fetich, &c.

NO NEGRO POETS, ARCHITECTS, NO GREAT MECHANICS, ETC.

Where, oh tell me where, sir, has the pure-blooded negro, unassisted by the white man, exhibited any of the triumphs of genius? Where have we found that race producing a Homer, a Phidias, a Praxiteles, a Socrates, a Demosthenes, a Virgil, or a Milton, or a Shakespeare? Where has it produced any great architect like Michael Angelo? Where any great poet, where any heroic soldier like Alexander, Cæsar, or Napoleon? Where any wonderful mechanic? What negro of pure blood ever started a steam-engine or a spinning-jenny, a screw, a lever, the wheel, or the pulley? What negro has invented a telegraph or discovered a star, a satellite, or an asteroid? What negro ever constructed a palatial edifice like this in which we are assembled, these corinthian columns, these frescoed walls? Negro history makes no mark in the great world's progress. That history is all a blank, blank, blank, sir. The negro can never rise above a certain range of intelligence. The children of the negro, up to ten or fifteen years of age, may be as bright and as intelligent as white children. They acquire knowledge as rapidly; but after that early age the negro youth does not advance as does the white youth. While the white man is increasing in knowledge till the day of his death the negro reaches before the age of maturity a point beyond which he cannot well advance in anything save in the arts of mere imitation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman tell us who Euclid was?

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that Euclid was a negro? Why, sir, he had not a particle of wool on his head.

Mr. GARFIELD. He was only an Abyssinian.

THE LESSONS OF LIFE—THE ARABS FIRST.

Mr. BROOKS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am about to show further that wherever there has been an admixture of a superior race with the negro the utter deterioration and degeneracy, if not the destruction, of the dominant race has been the result. Look at the history of the Middle Ages, when the men of our race were involved in mental darkness, when even the priests could not read or write, and when books were not printed. At that time the Arabs had almost all the knowledge and learning in the world. Under the banner of their prophet they started from the holy city of Mecca and swept along the whole northern coast of the Mediterranean, by Alexandria, Carthage, and beyond the pillars of Hercules; aye, carrying over the Sierra Nevada of Spain into the beautiful valley of the Grenadian La Vega their wonderful arts, as well as their victorious arms. They constructed the magnificent Alhambra; they created the Alcazars of Seville and Cordova. Our countryman, Irving, in glowing prose, with thoughts that breathe and words that burn, has pictured their marches and conquests, and their arts as well as their arms. The whole Christian world shrank and trembled before the mighty genius of this Arab race while it was overrunning Spain and threatening Europe with downfall. But in an evil hour they who had planted the noblest banners of poetry and of prose, of philosophy, and of history, in the front rank of the learning of the world; they who had invented the science of notation, and taught us decimals; they who had created algebra and given it the Arabic name; they who had measured the heavens in their astronomy, and given the very names we now use to the stars and constellations that sparkle in the sky; they who bequeathed to us the Arabic-named Almanac, (the Diary,) the little work now indispensable in every man's house—alas, they mingled the blood of their heroic race with the Nubian, the negro, with the inferior and degraded races of Africa all about them, and they rapidly fell from their exalted position into the degraded pool of races with whom they had commingled. These once heroic Arabs were driven from Grenada, and lingering awhile upon the coast of the Mediterranean, they fled into Africa, dishonored, degraded, destroyed, by forgetting their Arab nobility and becoming Nubians, negroes, and other inferior races of Africa.

THE OTTOMAN TURKS NEXT.

Years afterward there sallied forth from Asia, that great storehouse of nations, the Ottoman

Turks, under the banner of the prophet, and their crescent swept over almost the same breadth of territory that the Arabs had gone over before them. If they paused at the pillars of Hercules in the West, their cimexes flashed in the East under the walls of Vienna, and swept off every living man that showed himself on the open plains of Austria or Bohemia. But alas! they entered upon the same degraded crime of amalgamation and miscegenation, and they soon emasculated these once heroic Turks, the approach of whose crescent had made the Christian tremble in every court of Europe, and upon every navigable internal sea. In their harems the thick-lipped, woolly-headed negro woman was mixed up with the beautiful Circassian and Georgian, and children of all hues and colors and races were the product of this hateful miscegenation; and God—even the God of Mohammed—has punished the Moslem by his own degradation and his overthrow for violating that first law of nature—the preservation of the purity of race. The crescent no more waves in terror under the walls of Malta, as pirate or corsair, no more affrights on the Adriatic or the Danube, but trembles in doubtful existence on the Sea of Marmora. I myself have seen in Constantinople around a mosque where the sultan was at prayer some thirty or forty beautiful Circassians and Georgians of his harem kissing the hand of a eunuch, an Ethiopian, a negro selected from the interior of Africa as the custodian of these women, and who thus had become their master. The moment the Turk thus associated himself with the negro or negress and recognized him or her either as brother or sister, from that hour the Turkish empire began to crumble until it now exists only by the toleration of the Christian Powers of Europe.

THE MOORS AND THE NEGROES NEXT.

Let gentlemen, then, but study the history of the Arabs in their mixture of races; let them but study the history of the Turks, let them but study the history of Morocco, if they will ever take the trouble to study at all, and they will see what a fatal step they are taking now in equalizing unnatural races, or rather in subjecting the superior white race of the South to negroes from Africa. Muley Ismael was emperor of Morocco about 1680, and he had a negro as well as a Georgian wife, between whom and others were born from him, the historian records, eight hundred children, the last born when he was near eighty years of age. This Muley Ismael, in order to do what you in this Congress are doing, that is, to enforce a military despotism upon his people, neglected the Moors, and enlisted an army of one hundred thousand negroes, obtained from the coast of Guinea. Through civil war and bloodshed, and for over one hundred years, as you will find in the history of Morocco written by Cheuier, the Moors were in the most miserable condition a people could be in, almost all the time under the power of these negroes, these janizaries, these pretorian guards of the emperor, and they never ceased in their insolent demands and pretensions. It was not till 1780 that these one hundred thousand negroes could be got rid of by any device; and then through Sidi Mahomet, by cunning and fraud, they were reduced to fifteen thousand before they noted their weakness. It took a hundred years for the Moorish race to recover itself from the fatal crime of Muley Ismael; and it will cost a hundred years to recover from your legislation if the people continue you in power another election.

THE LATIN-SPANISH AND THE ANGLO-SAXON RACE AS SETTLERS ON THE AMERICAN CONTINENT.

But I need not go to the Mediterranean. I need not cross the Atlantic to show the fatal step you are taking by this reconstruction bill in going into this copartnership with negroes. Our continent has been settled by two classes of men—Anglo-Saxon, Celt, and Teuton in the North, and the Spanish-Latin race in the South. God never made a nobler race of men than the old hidalgos of Spain, who, under Columbus, in a little caravel of forty tons, started on the trackless Atlantic in search of the then unknown America. God never made a nobler race, I repeat, than these hidalgos of Spain. What did they do? They ran all along the Gulf of Mexico, from Florida, on the north, to Cape Horn, on the southern verge of South America. They settled Mexico and Venezuela, New Granada and Chili, and Peru, and coasting all the northern Pacific imprinted the holy classic names of old Spain upon the now golden mountains and wine-covered valleys of the State of California. They climbed the snow-clad Cordilleras, and planted their banner on every hill and every valley of Mexico, Peru, and Chili. They drove Montezuma from the halls of his Aztec ancestors, and under Cortez and Pizarro, Peruvian, Mexican, and semi-barbarian civilization fell before the mighty prowess of their arms. Their heroic deeds, their lofty chivalry, their Christian loyalty now read more like the romances of a Froissart than, as they are, the true records of history.

Our Anglo-Saxon fathers started later from the shores of England and landed upon the rock of Plymouth or upon the flats of Jamestown. The Puritan himself, trembling over his rock for a while, in terror of the tomahawk, ventured at last on what was then deemed gigantic heroism. He crossed the Connecticut and the Hudson, and slowly crept up the Mohawk, and halted for years and years upon lakes Erie, Ontario, and Huron. The cavaliers of Jamestown threaded their way up the river James, stealthily wound over the passes of the Alleghenies, and looked down at last with astonishment and affright upon la belle riviere of Ohio. But all this time these heroic hidalgos of Spain were spreading the name and fame of Castile and Arragon throughout the whole American continent, from Florida, on the north, to Cape Horn, on the south, and from Cape Horn to California, while our Anglo-Saxon race stood shivering upon the Ohio and Lake Erie without the courage to advance further. What, sir, happened then? What has produced this difference between us and the lofty hidalgo? Why are they fallen, these men of the Armada, so exalted among all the nations of the earth, who made our ancestors in the days of Queen Elizabeth tremble on the throne? Why was it that in the Mexican war one regiment of our Anglo-Saxon, Celtic, Teutonic blood, again and again put whole regiments of these once noble hidalgos of Spain to flight at Chepultepec, the Garita, and elsewhere? I will tell you why, sir. The Latin, the Spanish race, freed from that instinct of ours which abhors all hybrid amalgamation, reveled in a fatally tempting admixture of blood—indulged in social and governmental copartnership with Aztecs, Indians, negroes, one and all.

The pure blood, the azure blood of the old hidalgos of Spain, lost and drained, dishonored and degraded, has dwindled into nothing, while the pure blood of the Anglo-Saxons, the Celts, the Teutons, abhorring all such association and amalgamation with the negro or the Indian, has leaped over Lake Erie, crossed la belle riviere, the great Father of Waters, the Mississippi, crowded the mountain passes of Colorado, Utah, Nevada, and Montana, rolled over the Rocky mountains, and spread for hundreds of miles on the Pacific ocean—carrying not only there but everywhere, triumphant from the Arctic to the Antarctic, the glorious flag of our country, that emblem of a pure race, and ever contrasting the glory and honor, the prowess of that race with the degradation of the race of these once noble hidalgos of Spain.

Sir, you are on the eve now of an association and copartnership with a like inferior race which, if the people do not drive you from this Capitol, will be destructive of us all as has been a like copartnership to the Spaniards, the Turks, the Moors, and the Arabs. I have recalled these sacred lessons of history, and I hold them up to you for your admonition and warning. Heed, oh, heed! Strike, but hear!

I have here, sir, and will publish in a note a table of the different admixtures of races which have brought about the utter degradation of the white race in parts of Spanish America, and I hold them up to you as what you are legislating to make of us.*

Now, sir, this may be the last time in this Congress when I shall have an opportunity thus at length to address a white audience upon the floor of this House. [Laughter.] Aye, you are so hurrying up this reconstruction, as you call it, that the African will soon come down from your galleries and make his appearance here upon the floor, side by side with you, as a man and a brother. He is soon to be with you and part of you a Representative upon this floor. I tell you, gentlemen, that you make a fatal political mistake, for it will not be acquiesced in by the northern people, and your violent revolutionary acts here will be resisted in the elective tribunals elsewhere. In order to obtain a few additional negro representative votes upon this floor from the South you are

* THE MISCEGENATION IN PREPARATION FOR US.

The subjoined list shows the parentage of the different variety of half-castes, and also their designations, in Peru:

Parents.	Children.
White father and negro mother.	Mulatto, 1, or pure mulatto; half white, half negro.
White father and Indian mother.	Mestizo, 2, or pure mestizo; half white, half Indian.
Indian father and negro mother.	Chino, 3, or pure Zambo; half Indian, half negro.
White father and mulatto mother.	Cuateron, 4, or mulatto variety; three fourths white, one fourth negro.
White father and mestizo mother.	Croole, 5, or mestizo variety; three fourths white, one fourth Indian.
White father and China mother.	Chino-blanco, or Zambo-mestizo variety; one half white, one fourth Indian, one fourth negro.
White father and Cuaterona mother.	Quintero, 6, or mulatto variety; four fifths white, one fifth negro.
White father and quintera mother.	White, (7), or mulatto variety; nine ninths white, one ninth negro.
Negro father and Indian mother.	Zambo, 8, or pure Zambo; half negro, half Indian.
Negro father and mulatto mother.	Zambo-negro or Zambo with white; three fourths negro, one fourth white.
Negro father and mestizo mother.	Mulatto-oscuro or Zambo with white and Indian; half negro, one fourth Indian, one fourth white.
Negro father and China mother.	Zambo-chino or Zambo variety; three fourths negro, one fourth Indian.
Negro father and Zambo mother.	Zambo-negro or Zambo variety; quite black; nine tenths negro, one tenth Indian.
Negro father and quintera mother.	Mulatto dark or mulatto variety; four fifths negro, one fifth white.
Indian father and mulatto mother.	Chino-oscuro or Zambo and white variety; half Indian, one fourth negro, one fourth white.
Indian father and mestizo mother.	Mestizo-claro or mestizo variety; said to be often beautiful; three fourths Indian, one fourth white.
Indian father and China mother.	"Chino-cholo," or Zambo variety; two thirds Indian, one third negro.
Indian father and Zambo mother.	Zambo-claro or Zambo variety; three fourths Indian, one fourth negro.
Indian father and Chino-chola mother.	Indian with frizzly hair or Zambo variety; four fifths Indian, one fifth negro.
Indian father and quintera mother.	Mestizo, rather brown, or Zambo variety, with white; three fifths Indian, one fifth negro, one fifth white.
Mulatto father and Zambo mother.	Zambo (a miserable race) or Zambo variety, with some white; three fifths negro, one fifth Indian, one fifth white.
Mulatto father and mestizo mother.	Chino-claro or Zambo variety, with some white; two fifths white, one fifth negro, one fifth Indian.
Mulatto father and China mother.	Chino, dark or Zambo variety, with some white; two fifths negro, two fifths Indian, one fifth white.

Besides the half-castes here enumerated there are many others not distinguished by particular names.

jeoparding the domination of your party in the great North and West. The northern people are sound upon the subject of race, and where ethnology is discussed scientifically in the primary assemblies of the people they will become more and more sound, and become more and more converts to the principles I have been laying down to-day. But I know, sir, that it is vain for me to invoke the majority of this House to pause. I have too often sent forth vain invocations here and appealed to the majority of this House in vain and in vain. But, thank God, my voice and the voices of the few bold compatriots around me have gone beyond this Capitol and been heard among the people, who have responded by rolling up majorities in our favor such as we did not dream of so early after our vain appeals to you here on this floor. But if you blacken this House this session of Congress it will soon be whitened by the Democracy of the North and the West. It cannot be that God inspired Columbus to the discovery of this great new world only to drive out Pequods, Chippewas, Mohawks, Pottawatomies, Sioux, Cheyennes, to substitute here a government of Congo negroes from Africa instead. It cannot be that Almighty wisdom has gathered here the best blood from all the nations of Europe to be overwhelmed as Spanish blood has been, by the basest mixture of Aztec, Indian, and Congo negro. But to you, pledged, manacled to party, and loving party more than you love country, or God, or man, I know I speak in vain. A voice even from the dead would not now change a single opinion here, but we shall be heard and heeded elsewhere. Posterity will vindicate our foresight. History will do us justice, while a grateful country is already sending in its plaudits of "Well done, good and faithful servants."

Contested Election.

SPEECH OF HON. G. G. SYMES, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 10, 1868.

The House having under consideration the resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of Symes vs. Trimble, from the first congressional district of Kentucky—

Mr. SYMES (contestant) said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Thankful for the privilege thus conferred upon me, I proceed to address this as they do not in color materially differ from those specified.

1. Mulatto, from mula, a male or hybrid. 2. Mestizo, from the Spanish mestizar, to mix. 3. Like the Chinese in color. 4. Cuateron, or quadroon, as being the fourth remove from the negro. 4. In the West Indies the Creole is a mulatto; Criolla, in Spanish, meant the offspring of Spanish parents in the Colonies. 6. As being a fifth remove from the negro. 7. "White" here is still negro blood. 8. Zambo looks like an African word. In Spain pigeon-footed people are called "Zambos." 9. Cholo is another name for very Indian Mestizos.

The two first items in this table are from Schudi's travels in Peru.

The following is from M. de Laremandiere's history of Mexico, indicating the different degrees of the mixture effected between the three species of white, Indian, and the negro:

Mestizo 1, product of Spaniard and Indian woman. Castizo 2, of a mongrel 3 woman and a Spaniard. Spanish (1) of a Castizo and a Spanish woman. Mulatto, of a Spaniard and a negress. Morisco 4, of a mulatto woman and a Spaniard. Albino 5, of a Morisco and a Spanish woman. Tornatras 6, of an Albino and a Spanish woman. Tentandaire 7, of a Tornatras and a Spanish woman. Lobo 8, of an Indian woman and a negro. Caribou 9, of an Indian woman and a Lobo. Barbino, of a Coyote 7 and an Indian woman. Grifo 8, of a negress and a Lobo. Onisca, of a mongrel woman and an Indian. Albarazado, of a Coyote and an Indian woman. Mechino, of a Lobo and a Coyote.

1. Pure mixture. 2. Offspring of Mestizos. 3. Difficult to classify. 4. Is a mulatto. 5. As partaking of white mulatto variety. 6. A step backward. 7. Mulatto variety. 8. Wolf or Zambo. 9. Variety of Zambo. 10. Coyote is from the Mexican word for wolf, probably a variety of Zambo. 11. Variety of Zambo.

honorable body in behalf of myself and my constituents upon one of the most important subjects to the people of certain portions of this country that has ever been submitted for the consideration of this House. I hope I may be heard with a little patience, for highly interesting must every question be, sir, which may eventually affect the well-being of society, or the freedom or repose of that unfortunate portion of our country known as the border and southern States, and which, by an immediate and a direct necessity, must decide either fatally or fortunately whether that well-being, that repose, and that freedom are again to be restored to that portion of our country, with equality to all men before the law, is surely one of the most important subjects at this time that human wisdom can be employed upon. And, sir, this greatest-to-be-desired object in this country at this time can never be attained except it be by the true construction and rigid enforcement of all the laws passed by the law-making power. Without this everything must remain as it now is in those portions of the country, in uncertainty and confusion. It is upon this alone that the loyal people of the South and of Kentucky have relied for protection against those demagogues whose efforts have been to play upon prejudices and to array one portion of the people against the other.

Heretofore, sir, the loyal people of the South have relied upon the justice of their cause and upon the integrity of those who were to decide upon it. But their minds are now somewhat filled with fears, the more painful because hitherto unforeseen. They are now, from certain results which I shall mention, fearful that their cause may be looked upon as of doubtful merit, and that some of their rights, which they considered as defined by the wisdom and confirmed by the authority of the laws of the United States, are now, from the results of the reports of a certain committee, no more than idle claims, without either precision or security. I am sorry, indeed, Mr. Speaker, that I am unable at this time to offer that consolation to my constituents and the people of my district generally that I had expected, and that I can only join with them in regretting that some of the plainest questions of law, the results of which must in a great measure decide their prosperity, unity, and freedom, seem to be, since they have been submitted to a wise and sage committee of this House, perplexed with difficulties and uncertainties of which we never before dreamed, and which, I must confess, I am now entirely unable to understand.

But, Mr. Speaker, it would be presumption in me to impute injustice or anything but a true, legal, and just interpretation of the letter and spirit of the law as applicable to the facts of the case to the report of the committee on my case or any other, and we must therefore suppose that the determination of the committee, as contained in their report, embraces not that which policy dictated, but their true, conscientious convictions after mature deliberation under the difficulties surrounding the task of setting the first precedent in the construction of a law.

With a full appreciation of the difficulty of discovering some of the reasons which seem to have actuated the majority of the committee in arriving at their conclusions in this case I shall comment somewhat upon the law and upon the facts applicable to this case. This I shall do, not with the idea or vain expectation, or I might say even the wish of changing the opinions or votes of members of this House, but more particularly to simply justify the course I have taken in this contest. For if I cannot show that upon the facts contained in the affidavits upon the strength of which I served the notice of contest and which I submitted to this House in July last and upon which the House decided that if those alleged facts were true my competitor was not entitled to a seat here; if I cannot show upon a consideration of these facts and the law applicable to these facts at that time I had good reason to suppose my competitor ineligible to a seat here then I am liable to the censure of the people of my district and of this House, for I have kept the people of that district a long time from being represented in Congress, and I have imposed trouble and expense upon this House without any cause or excuse for so doing.

And here let me say that I did not serve the notice of contest in this case until my constituents presented to me the affidavits containing the evidence of facts upon the strength of which this man was not allowed to take the oath in July last, and upon the decision of the House at that time I felt it to be my duty to my constituents and to my country to prosecute this contest. Having performed that duty, I shall be satisfied with the result, whatever it may be. For it is a matter, under the present state of this House, of little importance which might get the seat; but the principle is of importance to the people of my district.

Now, to come to the question before us. Are the facts contained in these affidavits, upon which the House decided last July that my competitor was not then entitled to his seat, sustained by competent and sufficient evidence? If so, then do they bring this case within the letter and the spirit of the test-oath law? And here allow me to remark that I do think that cases of this kind ought to be viewed in a somewhat different light from the ordinary cases of contest brought here. In ordinary cases the simple question is as to which of two opposing candidates has received the greatest number of legal votes, and therefore who is entitled to the privileges and emoluments of the position.

In this case the question is whether these Halls shall be occupied in plain violation of the laws of the country; whether a law which has been passed by Congress, the strict enforcement of which has been enjoined upon every Department and branch of this Government as necessary to its protection and safety from its enemies, shall, as I have before intimated, be a reality, or whether it shall become an obsolete law, the enforcement of which shall be as idle as the pope's bull of excommunication against the first Napoleon.

I shall attempt to comment a little upon the evidence in this case. I say now, as I said before the Committee of Elections, that if the facts alleged in these affidavits, upon the strength of which this House in July last refused to allow this man to take the oath, do not show treason within the legal and accepted construction of the words of that clause of the Constitution of the United States "of adhering to the enemy, giving them aid and comfort," then I will yield the case. If you will examine the decisions of Judge Marshall and other leading jurists, those who abhorred the doctrine of constructive treason and refer to the cases mentioned in Wharton's Criminal Law as to what acts of sending provisions, &c., to the enemy have been decided to be treason you will see that these acts are plainly within the law.

It has been decided by this House that if acts are proved against a man which, in the judgment of this House, incapacitate him from taking the oath, then the proper enforcement of the law requires that he should not be allowed to take it. Gentlemen here well know that there are many men in this country who would walk up here, after having given aid and countenance to the rebellion, and take the test-oath, upon the ground that it is unconstitutional, that it is illegal to ask them to take it, and that to take it under those circumstances would not be perjury, either politically, legally, or morally; and they honestly believe this to be the case. And here, allow me to say, that in an argument with my competitor, in a private conversation, he stated to me that if Jefferson

HO. OF REPS.

Contested Election—Mr. Symes.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Davis should appear in these Halls with credentials of election from the Governor of the State of Mississippi, and should see fit to take the oath of office, there was no constitutional power in this House to keep him from taking his seat here.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SYMES. Certainly.

Mr. KERR. I would ask the gentleman if the statement he has just made is supported by evidence that appears upon the record of this case, or does he propose to rest his case upon the statements which he now makes here?

Mr. SYMES. I expect to rest my case upon the evidence; but I am now simply making my argument.

Mr. KERR. That is not an answer to my question; but I will not interrupt the gentleman's time further.

Mr. SYMES. In answer to the gentleman I will say that I have just been laying down a few premises and propositions to found my case upon. I think that when a man who is to be admitted to these Halls simply because he has once taken the oath has stated that he considers that oath unconstitutional, and that the House has no power to keep out Jeff. Davis if he would take the oath, I think that such a fact does bear upon the case. It bears upon the question whether any credibility should be attached to what this man has stated.

Now, sir, as to the evidence in this case, I will state that I rest my case upon a few overt acts substantially proved, consisting in sending supplies to the enemy. If such acts are not treason, precluding, when proved, all question as to Treasury regulations, all question as to the intention with which the acts were done, then I concede I have no case.

Now, sir, in the deposition of Ellithorp there are proved four distinct acts of treason committed by Mr. Trimble. One of these acts is the delivery by Mr. Ellithorp himself of three casks of bacon to a confederate commissary agent, and the sending of the proceeds, which he received in confederate money, but exchanged for Missouri notes, to the firm of Flournoy, Trimble & Co., at Paducah. This is in evidence in the case and cannot be denied. It further appears in the evidence that in July, 1861, Mr. Trimble went down into Tennessee among the rebel camps, and when asked how the business was proceeding and how the pay would be he replied that it would be all right. When the attempt was made to get around this evidence upon the ground that, although it is proved that this partnership carried on this contraband business, this man Trimble did not know anything about it, that he was absent from the city, I desire to call the attention of members to this evidence, which is not stated in the report of the majority of the committee, that he was down there at the store, between the two rebel camps, in the month of July, 1861; that he passed on below, and that he returned, reporting that it would be all right as to the pay, &c., for the goods which had been sent to the confederate agent.

These are the overt acts of treason upon which I rely. I have prosecuted this case as I would prosecute a case before a court. I have not prosecuted it upon any question of "policy." I have prosecuted it upon the principle that when there are proved against a man acts which in their very nature constitute treason it is not admissible to prove the intention with which they were committed. Such a defense might be made where the acts proved were not technically treason, as mentioned in the report of the committee in other Kentucky cases. I stated to the committee that if the acts which I proved to have been committed by Mr. Trimble did not constitute treason I would yield the case, for the presumption was in favor of my competitor, on the ground that he had pretended to be a "constitutional Union man."

If Mr. Trimble knew nothing about these acts how is it that they are corroborated by three witnesses in such a way that the evidence is not to be controverted? How is it that when Bolinger, in Cincinnati, in 1861, told Mr. Trimble that D. W. Ellithorp was there and that he was going to buy this lot of goods, Mr. Trimble told him that he was interested in the matter and not to say anything about it? It is not denied that these goods were to go to the confederate army, but Bolinger told him that Ellithorp said they were to go south into Tennessee.

Then, again, T. A. Duke swears, corroborating the testimony of Ellithorp, in regard to the large amount of goods which were sent up the Tennessee river. He states that in response to a request which came from the surveyor of the port of Louisville he examined a boat load of supplies which was permitted to go to Kentucky, but was transferred to another boat, without ever being landed in Kentucky, and went up the Tennessee river; and it could not have gone up that river at that time without going into the rebel lines; that these goods were marked F., T. & Co., and that Trimble told him (Duke) that he was a member of the firm, that it was Flournoy, Trimble & Co., and the evidence of the ex-confederate soldier Campbell corroborates the statements of Ellithorp about goods supplied to the confederates in Tennessee.

Gentlemen may talk about "policy;" they may talk about the "intention" with which certain acts were committed; they may talk about "constitutional Unionism;" but here are plain, palpable acts of treason, sworn to by one party who was a participant and corroborated by three others.

Now, sir, I do contend that the proposition will not be denied: if Judge Trimble knew any of those goods were to go South; if he was connected with this partnership and knew its object was to send goods South, and furnished means to carry on the business, then it is treason on his part, whether the goods ever reached their destination or not. If you will read the decisions of Judge Marshall and others on treason; if you will read the cases reported in Wharton's Criminal Law, and see in what cases furnishing money and provisions have been decided to be treason, then you will see that the facts in this case justify my conclusion.

And here, sir, I may argue it ought not to inure to a man's benefit that he pretended to be a Union man. I will dwell for a short time upon the evidence which is considered by the majority of the committee as setting aside the evidence which I have presented. The judge has brought up a dozen witnesses; and I will say they are among the most reliable men in the community, and they all swear to—what? They all swear that they do not know that the judge ever did these things. Well, I do not believe they do. They swear that they were constitutional Union men; and they further swear that the judge was a constitutional Union man. In my estimation I will say they are honest in their opinions, and that they are honest, constitutional Union men. What is it? It is simply this: that in 1861 they were for Kentucky neutrality and against secession, but that when the troops were called for, in violation of the Constitution as they maintained, they sympathized with the South, and have done so ever since, except some of his witnesses, who are good conservative Union men I know. Then there is another class of constitutional Union men different from these—I mean those who went into the rebel army to save the Constitution and who fought four years to save it.

But to proceed a little further, to show you the testimony which has been produced to combat the evidence I have presented, William Nolen is sworn. He swears that in 1861 he was surveyor of the port of Paducah to September 1, 1861, and that he was against secession, &c.; that he did not know Trimble ever sent any goods South, &c. I asked Mr. Nolen the question whether in July, 1861, when he was a United States officer under an oath to protect and defend the Constitution, he did not illuminate his house over the rebel victory at the first battle of Bull Run? He said he did. That is the evidence which is to set aside the evidence of one witness who participated in this contraband trade and of another who corroborated it.

Now, sir, I do contend that the test-oath law was intended to apply to just such men. There is no danger of men coming here to take the test-oath who fought in the rebel army. Many of them have too much manhood and principle to offer or to attempt to do it. I maintain that the test-oath was meant for such men as my honorable competitor, who could canvass and make speeches all day and contend that he was a constitutional Union man and at night send cargoes of goods and munitions of war to the enemy to break down the Constitution; who could come here in 1861 and on the strength of his being a great constitutional Union man obtain a permit from the Secretary of the Treasury to send $6,000 worth of goods to Kentucky, which, as the evidence of one witness shows, were sent up the Tennessee river, and sent into the rebel lines without touching the shores of Kentucky. Yes, sir, that is the history of the Unionism that is to set aside the prima facie case of disloyalty.

To go a little further, sir, when the war was over, when the South was willing to accept, and was accepting, in good faith the constitutional amendment abolishing the cause of all our troubles, the only curse and blot upon America's fair fame, then this great "lover of the Constitution" canvassed his whole district, arguing, as was characteristic of him, that it was unconstitutional to thus amend the Constitution so as to make liberty commensurate with and inseparable from the American soil, and to say to the stranger that no matter in what language his doom may have been pronounced, no matter what complexion an Indian or an African sun might have burnt upon him, that the moment he should hereafter touch the sacred soil of America the chains would fall from around him and he would stand redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the irresistible genius of American emancipation. It was to prevent this most happy consummation that this "lover of the Constitution," who wanted to come to Congress as such a great constitutional man, used all his efforts.

But, sir, let me go still further. We are told that this man is to be allowed to walk in here now and take his seat because he has already occupied a seat in this Hall without question. Was his admission questioned when he came here before? I was at that time a military commander in the district of western Kentucky; I do know that the man who ran against him was told to come here and contest the seat, but he was an old man and he knew the obloquy which would be heaped upon him if he should attempt to do it, and therefore he gave way and Judge Trimble came here and took his seat. But, sir, I beg leave to submit to this House upon what principle of law or justice that reasoning can be maintained which would give a man seat in this House because he has already occupied one here in violation of law for two long years? What is the beauty and perfection and security of your law if it be not the permanence of that law, if it be not that when the facts are the same the law is always the same? And I tell you, sir, that the only way in which you can restore peace and harmony to the disaffected portions of our country is by seeing that the laws are faithfully executed, and that every law passed by Congress shall remain until repealed to pronounce the same decision whenever the same facts arise.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Contested Election—Mr. Symes.

HO. OF REPS.

But again, I am told that this man is to be allowed to take the oath and occupy the seat here because it will not do to be so radical any longer. Mr. Speaker, I should be very sorry indeed to have my competitor or any other man kept from his seat in this House by any construction of law or facts which should be brought about by radicalism. But, sir, if it is radicalism to give a plain remedial law of our country a fair and just construction, such as it would receive in a court of justice, then I must hope to be considered a Radical. On the other hand, if it is conservatism to avoid the plain written laws of our country by a policy construction of them which excuses a man from the effect of a law for the reason that he has already violated them for two years, or that if he has betrayed his country, his friends, and his God he was moved by the same impulse and instigated by the same reason as Benedict Arnold when he betrayed us in the Revolution or Judas Iscariot when he betrayed the Saviour of Mankind—moneys. If that be conservatism, Heaven save us from it!

Let me say further that I wish to see this law construed upon the rules applicable to remedial justice. It is a remedial law, and it should be construed according to the rules peculiar to remedial justice. The first question to be considered is what the old law was, and then what was the mischief to be remedied, and what was the intent of the law itself which was to remedy it. In the first place, we know what the old law was. We know that any man could walk into this Hall and take the oath as a member provided he was twenty-five years of age and had been a citizen of the United States for eight years and an inhabitant of the State for which he was chosen, and no further questions were asked.

We had then arrived at a time in the history of our country when we were threatened with a rebellion which endangered the very existence of our Government. And there was the further reason, that we then had within those States still under the control of the Government greater enemies than those in open arms against us; men, as I have said, who, like my competitor, while by day they pretended to be for the Government and the Constitution of our country by night sent goods treacherously to the enemy to assist in breaking it up.

It was in consideration of such men as those, whom we could not watch continually, that this law was enacted; and it was intended by the very spirit and letter of its language—"aid, counsel, countenance, and encouragement"—to apply to those men. Why should not the language of that law be followed? Why was it put in the law?

Now, let me call attention to the great consideration relied upon by the defense in this case. The strongest point in the majority report, the strongest reason upon which it is based, is the fact that my competitor has already held a seat here for two years, and that it is proved by witnesses that he is a great "constitutional Union man."

Now, I will admit that had I been so fortunate or unfortunate as to have lived in another portion of this country; had I never personally known my competitor; had I never learned of his course or his inclination except from the speeches which he has made, I might have supposed him to be one of the greatest and most unflinching patriots in the world. If I did not know his course I could go to his speeches in 1862 and 1863 and find that which would lead one to believe that instead of sending supplies to the enemy, if upon his death-bed he would be almost ready to call his friends around him to catch his last words as in the delirium of approaching dissolution he would cast his eyes to Heaven, and cry out: "Oh! wrap the flag around me, for it is sweet to die thus."

I do not so much wonder that the gentlemen upon the Committee of Elections are so mistaken in regard to this man's position. But I would call the attention of the House to a few facts which have been proved before the committee, but which have been left out of this report of the majority. I would like to call their attention a little further to the evidence of the confederate soldier, Campbell. He stated that when he was in Tennessee as a confederate soldier W. F. Ellithorpe, the prominent witness against the contestee in this case, was arrested and brought to the confederate camp on the charge of sending information to the Federals North. But when he came to be tried he proved by the testimony of confederate soldiers that he had been sending supplies South to the confederate army, and that he received them from a firm in Paducah, and he was cleared upon that ground.

It is stated in the majority report that Judge Trimble was absent from Paducah when these acts were committed. Yet it is shown by the very next witness who was produced—but his evidence is left out of the majority report—that Judge Trimble passed South in July of that year to look after these supplies and the pay for them.

The committee asked the witness how he knew that Mr. Trimble was interested in these goods that passed up the Tennessee river, and he replied that Mr. Trimble told him he was a member of the firm. I supposed that the evidence taken by the committee in Kentucky and the depositions would be sufficient. But I have in my possession at the present time the affidavit of a man, whose name it is not proper to mention, who gives the name of a man, who might have been brought here had he been found in time, who would swear that gunpowder was sent to the rebel General Forrest and received by him from Trimble & Co., of Paducah.

But it would be out of place here to dwell upon the difficulty which I experienced in endeavoring to procure testimony in this case. I propose to dwell a little upon the facts as they are proved here, and to rely for my justification upon the action taken by this House in July last.

The affidavits proved and sworn to were already before the committee when they came to Kentucky. If I had had the time and opportunity, without having been compelled to bring my witnesses before the notary by attachments, I would have proved such a chain of circumstances, so many overt acts, that there would have been no question whatever as regards this Mr. Trimble. But the time has come, in the judgment of some gentlemen in this Hall, when the proof of overt acts of treason, when they were committed by a man who talks about the Constitution, yet who went to look after goods he had sent to the enemy, who did not deny that he was interested in those goods, is to be excused because he did it for money.

And it is proved by another witness that the goods went up the Tennessee river and were never landed in Kentucky. Are all these acts to be passed over as of no significance simply upon the ground of policy? If I had not supposed that the ruling of the committee and of this House would be the same to-day that it was last July I should not be here now urging this contest. I have felt justified in pressing this case in response to the calls of my constituents, because I was told in July last that if the facts then stated as reasons against the admission of Mr. Trimble could be proved they would be sufficient ground for his exclusion. I have expended much time and labor in presenting this case to the House. The Committee of Elections have ruled against me. Some of my friends are concerned lest the result in this case should ruin me in the section from which I come, because, as they think, the people of my district will conclude that I have been wrong in this contest because I did not succeed. I have no fears upon this point. If the majority of this House shall agree with the majority of the committee in holding that this man is entitled to the seat because he has been here before no man will submit with better grace than I will. And, sir, I would remind those enemies of mine who will be gratified at my failure in this contest—I will remind those friends who are fearful that this failure will ruin my prospects, professional and otherwise—that I am a young man; that I am one of that band of private soldiers who, in 1861, came here to defend this capital. And here I am reminded that my competitor, in his extreme love for the flag of the nation and the Constitution of the country, voted against allowing to the small remnant of these men an extra bounty of $100. This man, who came here as a Representative upon the strength of a canvass which he conducted upon the sole ground of opposition to the constitutional amendment, voted solitary and alone, with no copperhead on the north side of the river to vote with him, against indorsing the few of those men that were yet in the land of the living, by giving them $100 additional bounty.

Another reason that I am told has operated in favor of my competitor, and will cause men to vote for his admission, is, that he is a very harmless member of Congress for the kind, and that whatever his sympathies may be there is no danger of his originating any measure that will do any great harm; and as the district is bound to send a Democrat he is the least possible evil star of that kind. I admit this is of more force than any other defense offered.

I allude to these facts, not because they are evidence, but because they are as good evidence as many of the facts which have been proved here by this man to show that he was not a rebel sympathizer, but was a great "constitutional Union" man.

And, sir, I would like to refer to another vote which this man gave while holding a seat in this House. I am not assuming that it is evidence in the case; but it is of as much weight as the evidence which has been introduced by him to rebut the prima facie case made out by me. Sir, right upon the heels of the rebellion, when the last rebel gun had scarcely ceased to resound in the land—when it was a grave question with many leading financiers of Europe and of our own country whether, after surviving the greatest conflict of arms that any Government was ever called upon to meet, we should not be engulfed in financial ruin—my competitor stood here again, solitary and alone, with no Democrat to vote with him, and voted in favor of repudiation. I simply mention this to rebut the idea that his sympathies were with the Union.

One witness who swore that he had always considered Judge Trimble a rebel sympathizer was asked by the judge, "Have you not always considered me a national Democrat?" The language of the witness in reply to this was, "If Jim Buchanan, the traitor, and John C. Breckinridge are national Democrats, judge, you must be one." [Laughter.]

That, sir, is evidence in this case. It is not a mere statement. And now, as I find my time is drawing to a close, and as I find it will be of no great use to continue this argument further, I will only say that the object of my remarks has been to show this House I have conducted this contest for the people of my district on the same principle that I would conduct a lawsuit, and only ask that the law and facts would be applied in the same way. I wish to mention a few general facts in addition. I want to remark that it will be said and heralded by my Democratic friends and others in my district that I have been their enemy, that I have been trying to get into this Hall to represent the people against their wishes. I ask them whether it is not better to have men here who can secure some local legislation for them and for the good of this country than to have one here whose industry and talent are used for the simple purpose of voting "no" on every question which may be brought up.

HO. OF REPS.

Contested Election—Mr. Symes.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

I believe that the day will again come when the old State of Kentucky will send men here such as were her Representatives in the days of Clay and Crittenden, patriots to the whole country. I do not believe that a State with the past record of Kentucky, with the recollection that when her people were united and followed the teachings of such patriots, how happy, how prosperous, how rich and great she was compared with her condition since she has been adhering to the advice and following the policy of such sectional politicians as her latter-day saints, who advise her to a course that will only widen the breach between her people and also the General Government, who ride into office on the prejudices of the people, will long remain so. But I do think that the home of the Clays, Crittendens, Marshalls, Hardings, Godloes, and others as good and great, will yet emerge from her disaffected condition, from the mutations and changes which revolutions always bring, and will shake off those sectional politicians which now hang like an incubus upon her, those natural tails to a great civil war, and will again assume the name of the patriot State, and send men to these halls who will not prate continually about the prejudices of any section, North, South, East, or West.

Mr. Speaker, I will say, so far as regards this contest, it will be better for me, it will undoubtedly be a good thing for me personally, but it will weaken the Union party in my district, for whose benefit I am working.

It is said there was no doubt of his loyalty then. If there was, I am willing to give him the benefit of that doubt. I am more lenient than our illustrious President, who said "whenever you hear a man prating about the Constitution, spot him—he is a traitor." I am willing to give him the benefit of the doubt in favor of his loyalty until the contrary is shown, but when direct evidence shows the contrary it should remove the doubt.

I am sorry, sir, I did not have an argument prepared which I might have read before the House, which would have been more consecutive and presented my case in a better light. But I do not make this argument with a view to change the opinion of this House, although I might if I wished had a minority report to do it. I only make it in justification of the course I have pursued and to show this House and the people of my district I have answered their demand, made immediately after the election, to come here and make this contest. In July I was told if I could present the evidence I indicated that my case would be proved, and I have done so. If I were to take up the evidence to analyze it as it should be my time would run out. I only hope, in conclusion, that the time will again come when we will not be controlled by policy and expediency but by the rulings of law. I hope the time will again come when justice will govern. I hope the time will come when the remedial laws of our country will be considered according to their meaning and not according to policy. Either let the laws be carried out or repealed. It is a question of policy whether or not this law, passed during the war, ought not to be repealed ere long, but should not be a question of policy about strictly enforcing until it is repealed. The only way in which you will ever command respect in the disaffected portions of our country at this time is upon the basis that every law must be strictly construed and rigidly enforced.

Sir, I am sorry that I have taken up so much time in preliminary remarks. I did not suppose an hour was so short until I came to speak before the House. I have no time to dwell upon the evidence. I have no time to show that the very evidence upon which the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. McClurg,] who dissents from the majority of the committee, relies has been left out of the report of the majority.

I am sorry that I cannot have fifteen minutes more to dwell upon that, and to show that there is evidence in this case which ought to have sustained me; but I am satisfied it will be objected to.

[Here the hammer fell, the hour having expired.]

On motion of Mr. CHANLER, by unanimous consent, the time of the contestant was extended half an hour.

Mr. SYMES, (resuming.) Mr. Speaker, I thank the House, and I am very happy to find that there is a courtesy on the other side of this House among the Democrats that has not existed on the other side of this contest. I am happy to find that the day is again coming when men can differ on political questions without carrying their political differences into every other circle, a thing which has proved such a great curse to the State in which I have the good fortune to live. I trust the time is coming when we shall be able to discuss questions and present them before a committee without personal animosities. But I do not wish to occupy my time with such matters. I wish to refer briefly to some of the evidence in this case.

It is claimed by the majority of the committee in their report that it has not been proved by "clear and satisfactory testimony" that this man was connected with those acts of which I charge him. Now, let me ask, was I bound to do before the committee that which I should have had to do if I had been prosecuting him for treason before a court of justice? Is it the judgment of this House that it is not sufficient to prove an act by one witness, corroborated by several others, but that it must be made so clear and distinct as to be beyond all doubt, and that two witnesses must swear to an overt act of treason, as is necessary in prosecuting a man for his life before a court? If that is so, then I am willing to admit that this evidence might have been a little more corroborated.

I have proved that when Bolinger talked to Trimble in Cincinnati and told him that these acts were going on, and that $4,000 worth of goods were being purchased and sent to the South, Trimble told him as a friend not to say anything about it, for he was interested in it himself. Further than this, Duke swears beyond a doubt that he examined a boat load of goods at Paducah marked "F. T. & Co.," that Trimble told him that he was a member of that firm, and that the goods were allowed to go on up the Tennessee river into the rebel lines. This, mark you, was at a time when Judge Trimble had procured from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States a permit to ship $6,000 worth of goods a month to Kentucky. The proof shows that those goods were received in Tennessee and distributed to the confederate forces, and to preclude any rational doubt that Judge Trimble knew that this was going on we have evidence that he himself went down within the rebel lines and returned and reported that the pay would be all right for those goods.

Then, to look a little further at one point I have mentioned, the ex-confederate soldier, William Campbell, swears that Judge Trimble told him in 1861, before he entered the confederate army, that if he would enter that army he should have his old position when he returned. These are facts that cannot be denied, for they are sworn to and not contradicted.

I desire to state further, that the very morning my case was set for hearing before the committee I discovered that General Hurlbut was in this city. I knew he was in command in that district in 1862-63. He told me that he had official information on record that this contraband trade was then carried on there; that he had quite a distinct recollection that a train was captured near Union City on which were goods marked as having come from Trimble & Co. I asked that that witness might be examined, but they said the case must be closed, and they would not allow him to come before them and testify. I did not insist upon it because I supposed the committee were satisfied with the evidence they already had.

Now, it is stated in the majority report that the principal facts are contradicted by witnesses. Now, the great point upon which that report is based, the point upon which I knew it would be based when I heard the cross-examination of the principal witnesses by the chairman of the sub-committee that came to Kentucky, is as to the intention with which these acts were committed.

I investigated the law of treason. Then I told the committee that if these facts did not constitute treason of such a character that it did away with any question as to the intention of the acts I would yield my case.

Now, it is said that Judge Trimble could not have been engaged at that time in this contraband trade, for the reason that he had made a canvass as a great Union man just before that time against Hon. Henry C. Burnett. One of the witnesses swore that Mr. Trimble was in favor of coercion. I asked that Mr. Trimble might be sworn before the committee in order that I might ask him the question whether he had been a coercionist or not. When we were having the first joint discussion at Cadiz, the home of Hon. Henry C. Burnett, as I knew that the audience were almost all Democratic, and that the worst charge in their view that I could make against my opponent was that he was a coercionist, I did make that charge against him. He replied to that charge in words substantially like these:

"I said in 1861, when speaking from this stump in opposition to Mr. Burnett, that I would not vote men or money to subjugate the southern States; I have said so ever since, and I stick to that doctrine now."

And yet this man is to be excused upon the ground that he was for saving the Government.

These are the facts and circumstances against this man. I could bring Union men by the dozen who would testify that they believed that Mr. Trimble carried on this contraband trade, and I could bring Democrats by the hundred who, if they were put on oath and would testify, would swear that they thought that Trimble carried on this contraband trade. I have never heard men speak of it there but what they laughed about the fortune which Judge Trimble had made at this business. Yet men are brought before the committee by the dozen to swear that they did not know that Judge Trimble ever did these things. It is just like the case of the Irishman who went before a lawyer to get him to defend him against the charge of stealing a watch. "Why," said the lawyer, "I understand there are two men who will swear that they saw you steal the watch." "Be aisy, now," replied the Irishman; "niver d'ye mind that at all; and can't I bring a dozen who will swear that they did not see me steal it?"

Upon that principle this defense has been conducted. Sir, an examination of the evidence will show that the case against the contestee has been made out by clear and satisfactory testimony. I do not say that it has been made out exactly as it would have been if Judge Trimble was to have been hung for treason. I did not want to put it on that ground. The case is very different. If you show that a man in Kentucky has been guilty of these acts he is not going to be hanged for it; it only helps him in rising to high position in that State. I simply wanted to show the truth by proper and sufficient evidence, and give him the full benefit of it both ways.

Again, sir, I call the attention of the House to the fact that I put upon the stand about one dozen witnesses who all swore that they had always considered Judge Trimble a rebel sympathizer. It is shown, it is true, that for the purpose of getting these permits he pretended to be a great constitutional Union man; but, sir, if you will look at the evidence you will see that according to the testimony of many witnesses, when a man was recruiting for the rebel army in Kentucky, he made speeches for "the Constitution," and asked men to enlist in the rebel army "to save the Constitution."

Again, sir, it appears by the evidence of Mr. Hall, which is not mentioned in the report of the committee, that packages of goods in 1864 were sent by this firm, of which the contestee was a member, marked to go to places in Kentucky when in fact the persons to whom they were directed lived in Tennessee, outside of the lines; and it was unlawful and treasonable to send anything there. This was in 1864, although the pretense is made that Judge Trimble had nothing to do with such matters after 1861.

Now, sir, I wish to mention another combination of circumstances in this great chain of circumstantial evidence, which if I were before a court and jury I would defy any man to meet successfully. After the return of Ellithorp from his journey in connection with this great contraband trade, which was carried on under the guise of building a railroad in Tennessee and sending goods to the men engaged upon it, when in fact the goods were delivered to the confederates, W. F. Ellithorp testifies that he procured seven sacks of coffee from Judge Trimble's store to send to the enemy. This is not disputed, and he states that he took this through the lines himself.

Is evidence of this character to be set at naught upon the ground that Judge Trimble was a great "constitutional Union man?" It is in evidence that at the most critical period of the rebellion, when the Government needed to have its armies reinforced by thousands of additional recruits, when the civilized world was looking upon our conflict for constitutional liberty with doubt, wondering whether this great Government of the people should fall for the want of a few thousand more men—at that period this great lover of the Constitution told the people of his district that he would not give one more man or one more dollar to carry on the war. Yet because this man has already served as a member for two years it is claimed that he must be admitted now in spite of the record which is proved against him.

It would take, as gentlemen must perceive, two hours, without rambling, to present the facts and the law of this case. But, sir, before I close I would briefly refer to the question of law involved, and upon this question I feel that I can speak with some confidence, because I have extended my investigations over a period of nearly two hundred years, and I find that the principle upon which I stand has been clearly established as a principle of the common law during that whole period. That the principle that where the candidate who receives the greatest number of votes is ineligible, and the electors had notice or a good reason to believe he was disqualified, all votes cast for him are thrown away and the next candidate is entitled to the seat, as he has received the only legal votes cast, has always been recognized both by the courts of law and legislative bodies.

Now, if this were a question of doubtful constitutionality I should not wonder so much, but it is only an ordinary question of common law, and its right decision is reached by simply traveling for a few years the highway of precedent; and, sir, having traveled that highway, I stand here to say, without fear of contradiction, that if you will investigate the subject you will find I am right. I have not time to mention cases in detail. There are many that I might mention. The only American authority upon this point is Cushing's Parliamentary Law, and he positively declares that this is the American law. But my time is again up and I must close. In conclusion I will say that I have endeavored to discharge my duty by prosecuting this contest so as fairly to bring my competitor's record before the committee. It will be said that I have been the enemy of many of the people of my district for trying to keep their Representative out, but the time will come when they will be satisfied that he is and has been the worst and most deceitful enemy they ever had. He has proved himself in this contest exactly the opposite from the principles he pretended to entertain before his constituents, and his course shows that the wishes and interests of his constituents he will at any time sacrifice for his personal benefit. And if after having proved these acts against my competitor it is the opinion of this House, as it seems to be of the committee, that my competitor, proving himself a violent Union man and a coercionist, throws a reasonable doubt around them in his favor, or shows that if he did commit these treasonable acts he did it not because he sympathized with the rebellion but to make money, and should therefore be admitted, I abide by the decision.

SPEECH OF HON. ALBERT G. BURR, OF ILLINOIS, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 16, 1868.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 439) additional and supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867—

Mr. BURR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Distrusting as I do my own ability to discuss in a manner satisfactory to myself the subject which is under consideration in the presence of those whose legislative experience and ability so far exceed my own, I almost tremble, sir, in assuming to say anything on the subject. Let me remind the House and its members that the proposition under discussion is not a dry technicality; it is not for the purpose merely of deciding a given construction of the Constitution; but it is a decision in the legislative branch of the Government of the most important question which could be pressed upon the House for discussion, involving, in my humble judgment, the prosperity, if not the very existence of a republican form of government on our soil. The fathers, in framing the Constitution under which our Government to-day exists, were prompted and governed in their action by the spirit of compromise and a desire to harmonize the different conflicting interests represented in the Convention by the delegates from the various States. Let me ask attention briefly to the letter sent forth by the Convention which framed that Constitution, which letter is certified by the signature of George Washington himself, showing the Constitution was adopted as the result of a spirit of compromise, and showing at the same time, sir, the views which our fathers held of the powers vested in the different branches of the Government by the Constitution. A clause of that letter is as follows:

"It is obviously impracticable in the Federal government of these States to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all. Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend as well on situation and circumstance as on the object to be obtained. It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered and those which may be reserved; and on the present occasion, this difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests."

Sir, that difficulty, if we will view the case with candor, in the present day has been in some degree diminished, for by an amendment to the same Constitution, which amendment forms to-day one of the vital parts of that instrument, it is expressly provided what rights may be or are reserved by the people of the States, and what are granted by the people of the States to the General Government. It shows that our Government is one of delegated powers, delegated by the people to the Government in its several departments. This amendment, short and comprehensive, is as follows:

"ARTICLE X.

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Now, sir, in our form of government, as well as in a monarchy, there is somewhere existing the principle which we may term sovereignty. Does it exist in our form of government in the Executive? No. In the legislative department? No. In the judiciary? No. In all combined? No; but in the people, and all these departments of Government can exercise rightfully and constitutionally only such powers as the people have granted or delegated to them in the Constitution, which should be the rule and guide in the exercise of power for each and all of them.

But, sir, why have we three instead of one department in our Government? Without having time to read or quote the text, I will refer to eminent authors, among them Story and other commentators on different parts of the Constitution, showing the House that these vested powers in these three departments were so diffused under limitations and restrictions in the Constitution as to constitute guards of the liberties of the people against the invasion or usurpation of power by which their liberties would be endangered if they were under a monarchy, where one man's authority or power alone fills the place of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments as existing in our form of government.

It was well remarked the other day by my colleague, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that it is the theory of our Government so long as any one of these departments remains true to the people and faithful to the Constitution, just so long will the individual citizen have a guarantee for his liberty against any usurpation by either or both of the other departments.

Now, sir, with that statement of the interpretation of the Constitution, which I think is fair, that it is one of delegated power to each of these departments of the Government, let me ask the question, what is the framework of the bill now before the House? Is it to extend the limits of the executive power? No; but to restrict it within narrower bounds than the Constitution defines and expressly grants. Furthermore, it limits and circumscribes the bounds of action of the judicial department of the Government; and in proportion as it trenches upon the powers of the two, it assumes to extend beyond constitutional limits the authority and power of the remaining or legislative branch of the Government.

In the first section of each of the several articles of the Constitution creating these departments of the Government it is provided that the power in each direction shall rest in that department. As for instance, the comprehensive language of the Constitution in article one, section one, is that—

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

By what authority can we pass an act to change the legislative power and delegate it to the judicial or to the executive department? That language is no more clear and explicit than is the language of article one, section two, which prescribes the power of another department of the Government:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

And of article one, section three, which prescribes and vests the judicial power in another, by the following words of express grant:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Burr.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

But what does this bill propose? It proposes to nullify that section of the Constitution which places in the hands of the President of the United States the executive power of the nation. It proposes, in indirect terms, but in fact, to repeal that clause which says that he shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. And how do gentlemen attempt to answer that statement? The best argument I have ever heard came from the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who admitted with all candor—and I admire his candor—that in these reconstruction acts he did not consider himself limited or bound in his action by the Constitution, but that he was legislating outside of it.

But other gentlemen, his associates, see fit not to make that candid admission, but claim under various clauses of the Constitution some degree of authority for the measure which is now under consideration. And what is the first? I will refer to them briefly and give my views on the subject. If I am correct in the views which I entertain of the Constitution it falls far short of giving any such power.

Among the powers that are delegated to the Congress of the United States is the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, namely, the powers relating to coining money, organizing and providing for the Army and Navy, the militia, the establishment of uniform rules of naturalization, and various subjects enumerated; but last of all it says, "and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States and in any department or officer thereof."

Now, what power is vested by the Constitution in any department of the Government so far as the command of the Army is concerned? Where by this instrument does that power rest? The instrument expressly says that the President of the United States shall be, not a commander, but the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. But gentlemen say they have a right by legislation to provide for carrying into execution these powers. True, but are they attempting in this bill to carry into execution that power which is granted to the President as Commander-in-Chief? Not at all, but they are limiting that power. A distinction might be drawn here between the right of carrying into execution a given power and the right to destroy, paralyze or limit that power as vested by the Constitution. But as that clause has been sufficiently commented upon by my learned and eloquent friend from Indiana [Mr. KERR] this afternoon, I propose to refer very briefly to another.

The Constitution in another place, in this same enumeration of the powers of Congress, says that the Congress shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces. Under that clause gentlemen claim the right to prescribe that a particular individual may be vested with the power which is vested in the President by the Constitution to issue orders to the Army and Navy. They urge that by this contemplated action the President will not be at all relieved from his obligation to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States; and it is claimed that because he is not in express terms relieved of that responsibility his power is not abrogated by this act.

But, sir, suppose, as stated by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] that the President by constitutional authority issues orders for a colonel with his regiment to report for service at a given point, and the Commanding General under this proposed act issues contravening orders requiring the same officers and force to enter another and different field of service; shall the orders of the President or General be obeyed? If of the President, does not Congress yield its authority? If of the General, is not the act so requiring in direct violation of the Constitution, and under the executive responsibility, which gentlemen say is not removed, will not the President insist on obedience to his orders issued in conformity to constitutional power and obligation combined? and cannot gentlemen see in this conflict of authority the possibility of a collision endangering our form of government in all its points?

But, Mr. Speaker, what is the exact authority embraced in the clause giving Congress right to establish rules? We can find an interpretation of the extent of this right by comparing this clause with another on the subject of rules, and when the same terms are employed in a given instrument, the most clearly defined one that you can find furnishes the standard by which to interpret the same term in another part of the same instrument. In another clause it is said:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings."

That is a power unquestioned anywhere. What are the rules of its proceedings? The right to prescribe the hour of its adjournment; the right to put in motion such legislative machinery as may be necessary to carry on the business of Congress under the Constitution and in conformity with its provisions, but never in derogation thereof. Does any gentleman claim that under that right to prescribe rules for its government, this House can legislate to the effect that this act, when passed by a bare majority and shall have the force and effect of a statute-at-large without the executive sanction of being passed over a veto? That is not the extent of the rule, for the reason that it would conflict with other provisions of the same Constitution which confer the right to make rules. The rule must be in conformity with and not in conflict with the Constitution, which authorizes the promulgation of rules. And so in this case. "The Congress shall have power to establish rules for the government of the Army and Navy." Does that imply that Congress shall have power to divest the President of the United States, a coördinate branch of the Government, of his well-defined power under the Constitution to command the Army and Navy of the Union? If it would authorize the one it would sanction the other.

But, sir, these powers were distributed by our fathers in different departments of the Government for a wise purpose; and I know of no clearer indorsement of the wisdom of our fathers in that respect than to quote from an article which a few years ago was understood by our friends, who constitute the majority upon this floor, to be the law and the gospel of the Republican party. I adopt the sentiment which I shall quote as being correct political doctrine to-day. I read from one of the planks of the Republican platform of 1864:

"That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power"— that is why the powers of the Government were vested in different departments, to constitute a balance of powers, one checking the other, and each holding all in such well-balanced regulation as to secure the liberties of the people—

"is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends."

According to that something is to be accomplished. What is it? The "perfection and endurance of our political fabric." And how is it to be secured? By preserving that balance of power upon which it depends. How is that balance of power to be maintained? By securing to each State "the right to order and regulate its own domestic affairs in its own way." That is the way to maintain the balance of power, and that power, except so far as reserved to the States respectively or to the people, is vested in three, not one department of our Government.

That balance of power is essential to the preservation and perpetuity of the Union, and that perpetuity of the Union is necessary as a safeguard to the rights and privileges of every citizen in the Union.

But further, let me instance some cases which I think would be parallel with this, so far as the exercise of power by the three departments of the Government are concerned. Let me ask whether, in the view of any member here, the President could command or order the Supreme Court to enter a given decree—whether he could dictate a judgment to that court? Certainly not. Could he appropriate money or establish a rule of naturalization? No. Why? Because the right to do the one is vested in the legislative branch, the right to do the other is confined to the judicial department, and in either case he would be trenching upon the powers of another department of the Government. When, then, either of the other branches of the Government proposes to interfere with his constitutional power may we not well apprehend that we shall have a conflict among the departments of the Government or, if not a conflict, that the public mind, when the Constitution is thus openly disregarded and the rights and privileges of one department are usurped by another, will become so far demoralized as to lose all respect for that instrument which its public servants from day to day disregard and trample under foot?

Again, sir, could the judiciary establish post offices or appropriate money? Whenever the judicial department should assume so to do it would be trenching upon the functions of another department. Could it appoint an officer or prescribe rules for the government of the Army? Certainly not; because it would then invade the province of other branches of the Government.

But, sir, the attempt is made by gentlemen here to justify this exercise of power upon the ground that it is the duty of Congress by the Constitution to "guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." On this point I wish to ask a question—old, oft-repeated, but never yet answered. Is Virginia a State to-day? If it is a State for one purpose it must be a State for all purposes. If not a State for every purpose it is not a State for any purpose. If it is not a State then your legislation is not sanctioned by this clause, because your only authority is to guaranty to a State a republican form of government. What is a State as contemplated by this clause? It is a municipal organization in possession of an executive and in possession of a legislative branch; for the very same clause of the Constitution provides the mode of appealing to the General Government for the exercise of this power to guaranty. It provides that the appeal shall be made by the Legislature if it shall be in session, or by the executive if the Legislature be not in session. Has Virginia, by the recognition of this Congress, an executive and legislative branch? If so, and those branches of the State government are in successful operation, why do you term that State a military district and prescribe that a military officer shall exercise supreme authority, executive, judicial, as well as every kind of power that exists in any branch of the Government?

But sir, admit for one moment that there is authority for the exercise of such power, and that circumstances call upon Congress to do it, let me ask this question: Does this bill guaranty to Virginia a republican form of government? Is it a republican form of government when one man dictates the orders of the courts; when one man removes at his sovereign, unquestioned will and pleasure all civil officers from Governor down; when one man, ranking simply as a colonel, overrides all legislative acts and controls all departments of the Government, setting aside the will of the people, as recorded by their public acts? Is that a republican form of government? If it be so, then republican governments ought to sink and disappear from the sight of man forever.

Let me follow out the line of argument adopted by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] whose ability and candor I equally admire. He says that these States, by rebellion, lost their republican forms of government. I admit it. When the State of Virginia, (and I name that as one of the old original thirteen States,) when that State assumed by an act of legislative usurpation to pass an ordinance of secession, that moment the State ceased to be in harmonious relation with the Government of the United States and with her sister States under the Constitution. But had not Virginia been before that time in possession of a government republican in form? Most assuredly it had, or our fathers were greatly in error. When the result of battle and the tide of war brought a period of reflection to the minds of the people, and they, in the exercise of the same power and acting by the same volition, repealed that act of secession, did away voluntarily with all their offensive legislation, and assumed again the functions and powers of a State subject to the authority of the Constitution, resumed the position as a State organization which they had possessed before the period when mad fanaticism passed upon their minds, did they not then come again into possession of a government republican in form, as they were in 1858, before their attempted secession from the Union? If their framework of government was republican in form in 1856, 1857, 1858, or 1859, why does the same form of government, in the hands of the same portion of the people of the United States, and moved in the same channels, cease to be republican in form in 1868? If by rebellion they lost their republican form of government, then, by renewed allegiance to the Union that republican form of government was restored, else our fathers were greatly in error.

But, sir, it was stated the other day by my eloquent friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] that this is a contest between the friends and enemies of republican constitutional government. Sir, in the discussion of a constitutional or political question, or any question affecting the interests of us all, I dislike to hear any gentleman of any class denounce anybody as an enemy of his country. But, sir, when denunciation comes—when either by express terms or by way of implication I am forced to the conclusion that opprobrious epithets are to be applied to one class in contradistinction from another, I propose to examine where such terms may correctly be applied. What is a friend of a constitutional form of Government? One who adheres to that constitution in its letter and spirit. My friends on the other side need not point me to the rebellion in the South. They need not point me to the treason of a Davis, to the efforts of a Lee, or to the mad fanaticism of the masses of the people of the South. The rebellion has ceased. Members upon this floor have never been engaged in that rebellion. Gentlemen may use whatever language their own sense of propriety may dictate upon that subject. But, sir, for one I can say that I have never sympathized in any manner with the rebellion nor have my political associates on this floor. I could not, sir, when in 1860 I saw its first deadly shaft aimed at our own honored Douglas, the idol of Illinois. And when I saw the blow aimed at the institutions of my country, and the effort to strike down the flag of my fathers, I could not do otherwise than denounce and repudiate every man standing in active coöperation with the rebellion. Yet, sir, I adhere to the Constitution of our common country, and resist unconstitutional legislation as I did unconstitutional secession; and he who would willingly and wilfully strike down one clause of that Constitution is to that extent as much a traitor to his country as though the same effort were made upon the bloody field of battle. The man who is in favor of adhering to the Constitution, preserving it in its purity, obeying it in all its forms—that man is a friend of a constitutional form of government; and whoever is willing to depart from the ancient landmarks to abrogate one clause of the Constitution, to take away powers expressly delegated to one branch of the Government and vest them, against the provisions of the Constitution, in another—that man is perhaps unwittingly, but yet, in point of fact, to that extent actually an enemy of the institutions of his country.

Now, sir, I wish to renew a point which has been already made on this side of the House, and which was attempted to be answered by my colleague, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.] The war upon the field has ceased. We are to-day in a state of peace, so far at least as regards the movements of hostile armies. What was the promise upon which the war was prosecuted? My colleague said that the Crittenden resolution to which I now refer was a tub thrown to the whale of secession. A tub thrown to the whale! That, sir, was not the language used when in the most solemn hour of our nation's history every member on this floor, with but two exceptions, voted for a resolution declaring that the war "was not waged in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of the States." There are the negatives. There is a statement of what the war was not waged for.

Here is what it was waged for: "To maintain and defend the supremacy of the Constitution." For that and something else—what? "To preserve the Union." How? "With the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired." Where are the rights of the old State of Virginia, the mother of Presidents, to-day? What has become of her dignity and equality as one of the original thirteen whose wisdom created the Constitution and organized under it our glorious framework of Government? Our friends say her "dignity, rights, and equality" were submitted to wager of battle and staked on the fortunes of war, with adverse results. But, sir, the resolution to which I have referred pledged the Government to sustain that State and preserve her dignity, rights, and equality unimpaired. The act of attempted secession disturbed her harmonious relations—if you please, interrupted her republican form of government—and the object of the war on the part of the Government was to restore that harmony and preserve her dignity as a State in the Union—not a district outside the Union; to maintain her equality as a State under the Constitution—not a military department, or a dead State "outside the Constitution." In other words, sir, the avowed object of the war was to guaranty to Virginia, in common with other southern States, a republican form of government. And those States having each resumed at the close of the war the same constitutions, modified only by amendments prohibiting involuntary servitude and repudiating the payment of the rebel debt, that such States respectively possessed before the commencement of the war, are they not each as much and as fully possessed of governments republican in form as before the rebellion occurred?

But again, sir, let us notice a distinction not made by gentlemen in arguing this question of power under this clause giving Congress the right to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. It is not a grant of power to create for any State a republican form of government; that is the right of the people of that State. The very language of this clause—"guaranty to each State a republican form of government"—presupposes such republican form of government to be already in existence; and such was really the fact. There were representatives assembled from the original States to act as delegates of the people in forming the framework of a government to supersede the original "Articles of Confederation," which framework became necessary, in their judgment, "in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty" to themselves and their posterity; and when their labor was completed the world gazed with admiration upon the peerless Constitution of 1787; and our fathers, in publishing it to the world, certified that it was "done in convention by unanimous consent of the States present" on the day when it was attested by the signature of the "father of his country."
